

Criticism grows of Ivztan's moves

By ROBERT ROSENBERG
Jerusalem Post Reporter

Police Inspector-General Rav Nitzav Arye Ivztan has no intention of resigning over the Hefetz case, sources close to the national police chief said yesterday.

But criticism of Ivztan inside the force and outside seemed to be growing, and many officers doubted he would be able to retain his job. During the weekend, Ivztan recommended to Attorney-General Yitzhak Zamir that Nitzav-Mishne Assaf Hefetz, suspended commander of the Police Central Unit, be charged with the criminal offence of speaking about classified intelligence material with unauthorized personnel.

Hefetz was suspended from the force last week after he was discovered — through a telephone tap — to have discussed with reporters a classified police intelligence document that he said already a year ago named suspects in a plot to blow up the Temple Mount, and that Jerusalem police had not acted on the information. However, The Jerusalem Post has reported that the intelligence document involved made no mention of the Temple Mount, referring only to suspicions that one of the suspects still at large, Shimon Barak, had been plotting an attack on churches and other non-Jewish religious institutions. The Post has also reported that, in fact, the Jerusalem police twice followed up the intelligence information, but without success.

Despite assurances made by sources close to the inspector-general that an internal Ministry inquiry would vindicate Ivztan's decision to suspend Hefetz and that "the storm will pass," there appeared yesterday to be snowballing public support for Hefetz. In addition to the petition calling for his reinstatement and the suspension of Tel Aviv District Commander Nitzav Avraham Turgeman organized by his loyal subordinates in the Central Unit, there was a demonstration of several hundred supporters outside Hefetz's home yesterday. Furthermore, at least one ex-agan-nitzav (chief superintendent), Amnon Halpert, has publicly called for Hefetz's reinstatement and the removal of Ivztan, Turgeman, and the head of the Criminal Investigations Division, Nitzav Yehzekel Carthy. Meanwhile, Hefetz, who won the Medal of Valour — the police's highest distinction — for killing three terrorists in the Coastal Road massacre of 1978, got support from another recipient of the same award, who threatened to return the medal to the police if Hefetz is not reinstated.

Hefetz's lawyer, Dan Cohen, is to go to the High Court of Justice today to seek an injunction that would return Hefetz to his job. But sources close to Ivztan last night emphasized that the suspension was conducted lawfully and that "at best" Cohen could hope for a "procedural ruling."

Nitzav Commander Zvi Bar, chief of police operations and known as Ivztan's chief opponent inside the force, reiterated at the weekend his belief that Hefetz was not the originator of the leak. Bar also said that he has still not seen any intelligence material that predicted an attack on the Temple Mount. As head of operations, he said, he is responsible for the protection of the site and would have to bear responsibility.

Two soldiers wounded

By MENAHEM HOROWITZ

METULLA. — Two Israeli soldiers were wounded on Friday morning when an explosive charge went off by the Shi'ite village of Habush near Nabatiya as an Israel Defence Forces patrol went by. IDF units searched the area, which has been the site of previous attacks on IDF patrols.

Also on Friday, a katyusha rocket was fired at noon at an IDF position two kilometres south of Lake Karoun. This was the second time last week that katyushas were fired at Israeli positions. The first was at an outpost near Nabatiya on Tuesday.

3 Democrats still in race as Glenn ends campaign

WASHINGTON (AP). — From industrial Michigan to the deep South and beyond to Puerto Rico, Walter Mondale is counting on putting together a weekend surge to derail Gary Hart's momentum.

Democrats in five states were to hold caucuses or meetings yesterday to begin allocating 301 delegates to the Democratic national convention in July that will nominate the party's candidate for November's presidential election. Democrats living in Latin American countries were to meet in the Panama Canal Zone to decide how to allocate their three convention delegates.

Puerto Rico holds a primary today to allocate 48 of the commonwealth's 53 convention delegates. "The biggest prize of the weekend was Michigan, where Mondale has the support of the powerful United Auto Workers Union and Governor James Blanchard.

The Democratic contest slimmed down to a three-man race after Senator John Glenn announced on Friday that he was ending his candidacy after disappointing finishes in the early primaries and caucuses.

From an original eight-man field, that left Mondale, Hart and the Rev. Jesse Jackson, the black leader.

Michigan, Arkansas, Kentucky, Mississippi and South Carolina were to hold party caucuses for their residents yesterday.

Hart said on Friday that during a war in the Middle East, the U.S. should not send troops to protect or restore the flow of Gulf oil to its allies in Western Europe or Japan.

Syria will now press for Israel withdrawal

By DAVID LANDAU
Post Diplomatic Correspondent

Syria's next aim in Lebanon is to bring about the complete withdrawal of Israeli forces from the south.

Syria's method, say Israeli analysts, will be to press for the immediate reorganization of the Lebanese Army — with a smaller Christian component in the senior officer corps — and the prompt despatch of units to the south.

According to the Israeli analysts, Syria is expected to insist that any "security arrangements" devised for the south be contracted between the armies of Lebanon and Israel. Syria is urging that future contacts be held within the framework of the long-defunct Israel-Lebanon Mixed Armistice Commission (ILMAC), the UN-chaired machinery set up in 1949.

The Israeli analysts assess that Syria wishes to avoid military tension with Israel in Lebanon, especially because of the behind-the-scenes power struggle that is still apparently preoccupying President Hafez Assad in Damascus. Hence the Syrians will strive to dislodge the Israeli Defence Forces from South Lebanon — following up on their success in abrogating the May 17 agreement — by political means.

The analysts stress that there are no fundamental doctrinal or policy differences between the vying groups in Damascus. All the rival factions share the hardline approach to the Israel-Arab conflict that has been the hallmark of President Assad's 14-year rule. And all share, too, his basic belief that Syria should seek close political control over neighbouring Lebanon.

For Assad, as for his ambitious younger brother, Rifaat, and the other contenders for the succession, Syria's aspirations in Lebanon are not merely territorial or strategic. They go to the heart of Syria's role and self-image as a leader of the Arab world and as the champion of the Arab cause in the conflict with Israel.

Syria's recent success in Lebanon is seen in Damascus, say the Israeli analysts, as an important boost to Syria's overall standing — especially since all the major international and regional forces were active in the Lebanese arena. Syria has learned the lesson, however, of its eight-year sojourn in

Agreement still eludes Lausanne delegations

Jerusalem Post Staff
and agencies

LAUSANNE, Switzerland. — After 48 hours of informal hard bargaining, leaders of Lebanon's rival political factions met in a plenary session yesterday to begin crucial deliberations about a draft document on national unity. It is hoped that agreement on such a document will be reached at the reconciliation conference.

The session ended late last night and will resume this morning.

Meanwhile, in and around Beirut early yesterday, Christian and Muslim militiamen battled with mortars, rocket-propelled grenades and heavy machine guns. Police and hospitals said at least 13 persons were killed and 35 wounded.

The heaviest casualty toll for a single night since Lebanon's nine principal leaders began their talks in Switzerland proclaimed a cease-fire Tuesday.

The plenary session at the Lausanne conference yesterday discussed a draft document prepared by Lebanese President Amin Jemayel. The draft is based on proposals for political reform that were raised by the parties to the Lebanese conflict, and on recommendations by two committees that met on Thursday and Friday to try to bridge the differences between the delegation heads.

Conference sources have reported that the document contains a series of proposals for restoration of the country.

U.S. diplomat in Beirut kidnapped without trace

BEIRUT (AP). — U.S. Embassy officials said yesterday they had no clues on kidnapped American diplomat William Buckley, while President Ronald Reagan's administration announced it had contacted Lebanese officials and Syria over the abduction.

"We have nothing at all, nothing since yesterday (Friday)," said an embassy spokesman. "No claims, no phone calls, nothing."

Three gunmen kidnapped Buckley, 55, on Friday, forcing him into a car at pistol point in front of his house in mostly Muslim West Beirut and then speeding off.

At a news conference after the abduction, Robert Pugh, the embassy's first secretary and head of the mission in the absence of Ambassador Reginald Bartholomew, suggested American diplomats remaining in Beirut would be asked to move into the Marine-guarded compound in the seafort Ein Mreisseh neighbourhood. "I think a decision will be made" to that effect, he said.

Two other Americans, journalist Jeremy Levin and American university professor Frank Regier, have been reported missing since February 6 when Muslim militiamen took control of West Beirut from the Lebanese Army. No one has claimed responsibility in any of the abductions.

Buckley, first secretary in the embassy's political section, became a foreign service officer last year and was on his first assignment. The State Department said in Washington.

Ghali: Jordanian-PLO agreement in offing

Egyptian Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Butros Ghali said in an Israel Television interview broadcast on Friday that he believed the PLO would eventually agree that Jordan negotiate on its behalf a solution to the Palestinian problem. He added that he hoped Middle East peace negotiations focused on the future of the West Bank and Gaza would resume in a few weeks.

Ghali pointed to the near-agreement between King Hussein of Jordan and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat last April as proof that they would reach agreement soon.

"We are in contact with both the Jordanians and the Palestinians. We are encouraging them to reach an agreement so we can move to a second step and renew negotiations with the Israelis, the Palestinians and the Jordanians," Ghali said.

Regarding Lebanon, Ghali said that an Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon "would encourage the Palestinians and the Jordanians and the moderates among the different Arab elements."

Ghali intimated that Egypt ex-

Cairo, Khartoum blame Libya Full alert in Sudan after Tupolev raid

KHARTOUM (AP). — The Sudanese Army and Air Force went on full alert yesterday after an air raid by a single Soviet-built bomber of unknown origin on Friday on a suburb of the capital Khartoum. Five persons were killed and two wounded.

Sudan and Egypt immediately coordinated defensive measures to prevent a recurrence. The two countries are bound in a defence pact.

Sudanese President Jaafar Numeiri yesterday told a seminar of army officers that Egypt has sent troops to Sudan to help it defend itself against external attack.

Numeiri and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak blamed Libya for Friday's air raid. Egyptian Defence Minister Abdel-Halim Abu-Ghazala warned that a recurrence would have "very grave consequences."

"It's a very dangerous act, a mad act," Mubarak told reporters in Cairo. "Those who did it are not a civilized country under any circumstances."

Abu-Ghazala pledged unlimited Egyptian military aid to Sudan and said Egypt is "going to be aggressive to stop any aggression against Sudan." He rushed to Khartoum on Friday afternoon and was immediately closeted with Numeiri for military consultations.

Sudan and Egypt concluded a joint defence pact in 1976. It provides that each side would extend military aid to help defend the other.

Shortly after Abu-Ghazala left Khartoum on Friday night, another Egyptian envoy flew into the capital for political deliberations. He was Osama al-Bas, top political aide to Mubarak.

"We are going to take some measures to prevent such incidents in the future," Abu-Ghazala told reporters following his talks with Numeiri. He did not mention Libya.

Abu-Ghazala said Egypt considered the air raid "a serious aggression" and he cited the joint defence pact for the planned joint defensive measures. He gave no details.

The official Egyptian Middle East News Agency said yesterday that Sudan's army chief of staff, General Siwar el-Dahab, arrived in Cairo yesterday afternoon for "urgent military talks."

There was no word on the nationality of the attacking plane, but the authoritative Jane's All the World's Aircraft says only Libya, Iraq and the Soviet Union hold the TU-22, a sophisticated long-range bomber.

Orthodox demonstrate again in Petah Tikva

PETAH TIKVA (Itim). — Thousands of Orthodox demonstrators braved rain showers to protest on Friday night against the continued Sabbath showing of movies and sale of tickets at the Heichal cinema house here.

The demonstrators gathered outside the town's central synagogue to hear speeches by the two local chief rabbis, Baruch Salomon and Moshe Malka, as well as a speech by the chief rabbi of Rehovot, Simha Kook.

Rabbi Salomon, who was arrested a week ago for disturbing the peace, called on the policemen guarding the cinema to "return your batons to their armories, we are not impressed by them and not frightened of them. We shall defend the Sabbath."

Indoors, The Blues Brothers was shown to hundreds of moviegoers who preferred the screen to the spectacle outside.

At about 10 p.m., when the policemen went back to their vehicles because of the rain, the demonstrators, who had marched to the area in front of City Hall, began to move towards the cinema. But when the demonstrators approached the cinema, crying "Shabbos, Shabbos," the policemen left their vehicles and formed a human chain blocking the demonstrators' path and driving them back to City Hall.

At around midnight, the demonstrators dispersed.

A senior police officer said that no pressure was being applied to the police to close the file against Salomon, who is being investigated for disturbing the peace a week ago in the town's Gan Eden coffee house.

Talking to reporters, Central District Police Commander Nitzav Gabi Amir said that the police are still investigating Salomon's and others' involvement in the fracas in the coffee house.

Amir said he was angered by the fact that policemen, including religious policemen, had to work on the Sabbath in order to protect demonstrators protesting against the desecration of the Sabbath.

El Al aims to fly despite New York strike

By JOSHUA BRILLIANT
Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — The major test of strength in the three-day-old El Al strike in New York is expected this morning when management will try to circumvent the strikers and send its first flight to Israel. The flight is scheduled to depart at 6 a.m. Israel time.

Half of El Al's revenue comes from its transatlantic route, so the continuation of the flights will be important in determining the outcome of the power struggle.

Reports reaching Tel Aviv last night said the only damage so far was to two catering-company trucks whose airbrake hoses were slashed. The hoses were repaired immediately.

The strike, involving 225 unionized employees, members of District 100 of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, started Friday at 7:30 a.m. Israel time.

The workers are fighting management demands to fire 23 employees, cut all wages by 10 per cent, reduce vacation leave, and make workers perform several tasks if needed. If embodied in the new work agreement, these measures would save the national carrier some $2 million a year, director-general Rafi Harlev estimated.

Negotiations over the new work agreement started last spring, but reached a deadlock, and attempted mediation failed last month.

El Al hopes to continue its services with the help of some 100 non-unionized American workers, 22 persons flown from Israel and Israeli employees flown to New York from El Al's other U.S. branches.

Last Thursday management took advantage of payday and made all workers who came to collect their money turn in their employee identification cards. New cards were issued only to those expected to work despite the strike. So the strikers have no card enabling them to enter the sensitive areas in the airport and town offices, and to disrupt work there.

AP adds: El Al's New York general manager David Schneider, in a statement issued on Friday morning, vowed that "this strike will not affect either passenger or cargo service under any circumstances."

Knesset may decide on Thursday

Labour's early-poll bill on House agenda

By SARAH HONIG
Post Political Reporter

TEL AVIV. — The Alignment Knesset faction has decided to ask for a Knesset debate this week on a bill calling for elections this summer. It wants the vote to be held on Thursday.

The move was described by some in Labour as "brinkmanship." The party is taking a risk if it goes through with its plans to legislate a new election date without having first obtained Tami support, because such a bill can only be submitted once in six months. If the present bill fails, another cannot be put to a vote till September.

The Alignment bill specifies that elections be held in 100 days, in effect scheduling them for early July, instead of the scheduled date of November 1985.

Labour is keenly interested in summer elections and has been carrying on an intensive campaign to convince the three Tami Knesset members to support an early-elections bill before the Knesset goes on holiday at the end of this month. But Tami last week decided not to decide on early elections before mid-May, when the recess ends.

According to some Labour sources, anger with Tami is the prime reason for the decision to submit the elections bill without that party's backing. The motive is to show Tami that Labour is not dependent on it. Labour insiders say that Tami signalled to Labour that it is interested in early elections and that it would support early elections, especially as Labour stressed that the two votes needed to assure the bill a 61 vote majority would be cast by Yitzhak Berman and Dror Zeigerman of the Liberals. But Tami led Labour on and Labour is now showing that it is fed up, these insiders maintain.

Other party sources say Labour has a deeper design. According to this view, Tami indeed wants early elections, although the date it wants is different from Labour's. By resorting to an early elections bill without Tami support, Labour could force Tami's hand and ensure its support for the bill regardless of the decision to wait. Tami would fear a Labour defeat, lest it postpone another bid for early elections

Herzog: Defence still national value

AFULA (Itim). — President Chaim Herzog on Thursday night told a conference of former Hagana commanders at the former Hagana camp of Juara that he is distraught at "the erosion in motivation and sense of mission" among youth regarding service in the Israel Defence Forces and volunteering for command posts in the regular army.

"If there is a purpose to this large gathering, beyond nostalgia, it is the message of education, of ideals and a call to the youth of today that the work is not finished, that defence is still a necessary value, that the need for sacrifice and devotion and volunteering is still vital," said Herzog.

The Juara camp near Ein Hashofet in Western Samaria was the first training camp for the Hagana, the pre-state Jewish defence organization. Many of Israel's top commanders, including chiefs of staff, attended training courses there. It is now a Gdina training base.

The name "Juara" has come to symbolize the revival of an independent Jewish fighting force in Eretz Yisrael.

MK ESHEL CHARGES

Police chief prevents national traffic force

By AARON SITTNER
Jerusalem Post Reporter

Police Inspector-General Rav-Nitzav Arye Ivztan is thwarting attempts to set up an urgently-needed national traffic police force, Knesset Member Tamar Eshel (Alignment-Labour) charged on Friday.

Eshel, chairwoman of the Knesset's sub-committee on road safety, addressed a conference of district coordinators of the National Council for the Prevention of Accidents at the Jerusalem Sonesta Hotel.

She said: "Though we did not rush to the news media to publicize the fact, I can tell you that the most recent meeting of our committee actually blew up when it became evident that the inspector-general is getting in the way of a national-level police force to take on the fast-growing war against road accidents."

Suggesting that the police hierarchy fears the sharing of authority with any new law-enforcement organization, she added: "Although Interior Minister Burg, on the advice of the Police Advisory Council, has himself recommended establishment of a national traffic police, Ivztan told us nothing can move forward unless he is given an additional 185 payroll slots. And he has also tagged on certain demands connected with organizational details.

"Since the Treasury representatives at the meeting promptly rejected the idea of additional civil-service job slots, the promise of a national police force in the near future has faded into oblivion. I intend to summon Burg before our committee when he returns from abroad."

Moshe Amirav, director of the Transport Ministry's Road Safety Authority, told the conference that with road construction and repair budgets frozen in the face of burgeoning motor-vehicle ownership, "the only salvation apparent now seems to be the two-to-five-per-cent petrol surcharge we hope the government will approve, so that we can go ahead with our work."

He said the only other non-State Budget funding available for accident prevention is a part of the automobile licensing-fee revenues, which are allocated to the local authorities for local road-safety activities.

According to Amirav, five more so-called "Bloody Highways" — stretches of roadway where fatal mishaps repeatedly occur — have been assigned top-priority in the Public Works Department's list of projects. He hoped funding for these projects "would somehow be got from the Treasury."

IVTZAN UNDER FIRE

sibility if there were any failure to do so.

A high-ranking police source expressed astonishment over the telephone tapping of Hefetz, whose Central Unit detectives are considered the elite police force in the Dan Region. "Now they are really forcing us to leak to the press," said the source.

Meanwhile, sources in national headquarters said that "probably" no disciplinary action would be taken against the Hefetz loyalists who organized the petition against Turgeman and refused to work the day after Hefetz's suspension.

One highly placed source said that "they'll probably cool off and realize that the police can't stop catching crooks because of this."

On Friday, Ivztan and Carthy sent the police file detailing their suspicions about Hefetz to Zamir, with an attached recommendation that he be charged in criminal court.

The Post has been told by a high-ranking police source that Hefetz spoke with four separate reporters, "for several hours" about the intelligence report. "We have it all on tape," he said.

The source, who is close to Ivztan, said that the inspector-general "had two choices — either to cover up the affair or to take action about the leak. Obviously he couldn't cover it up. And the system cannot allow this plague of leaking to continue."

The source rejected out of hand questions about the ethics and significance of a police commander tapping the private home telephones of his own senior officers.

"I don't understand that. Telephone tapping is legal. It may not be nice, but it is legal and it is surely a legitimate investigative means," he said. He described as "theatrics, pure and simple," a Friday night television news report showing Bar warmly embracing Hefetz at the suspended officer's home.

But there was no doubt last night that the tapping and continuing controversy had seriously demoralized the police force's upper ranks, creating an air of intrigue among the officers.

High-ranking officers expressed bitterness about the telephone taps.

which seemed, as an issue, to begin to overshadow the original controversy — the Hefetz suspension.

"There's something rotten in the force if officers feel they have to leak information and if the commanders feel free to tap our phones," said a senior officer.

The Post has learned that Jerusalem District Court President Yehuda Weiss was the judge who gave the police permission to tap Hefetz's phone. The Post has also learned that the phones of other officers and some newspaper reporters are still being tapped.

With Interior Minister Yosef Burg abroad — he is due back on Tuesday — there was hesitancy about discussing the possibility of an Ivztan resignation. Burg's absence itself is becoming controversial inside the force. Burg and Ivztan are due to appear before the Knesset Interior committee on Wednesday, about the Hefetz case.

Many officers were predicting that if the internal inquiry by police comptroller Shmuel Eitan does not "unequivocally vindicate and justify" all of Ivztan's decisions in the last week, the inspector-general "will have to go." And if he goes, it was considered likely that Carthy, who is backing Ivztan, will also have to resign.

But the source close to Ivztan yesterday told The Post that the material in the case against Hefetz is solid — even if it is based on taped telephone transcripts.

And the source denied the original newspaper report alleging that there had been a serious failure in intelligence procedures regarding Barda's involvement in the Temple Mount gang.

Indeed, the biggest complaint by Ivztan's supporters in national police headquarters against Hefetz is that neither Hefetz, nor the original source of the information about the alleged mishap, gave the internal police bureaucracy the opportunity to check if there had been a failure.

"If the leak had come a week after the police command had been told that Jerusalem didn't act on Tel Aviv's information, then I would have been a lot more forgiving about the leak," said the source close to the inspector-general. "But we only learned about the so-called failure at the same time as the newspaper reporter."

Temple Mount suspect released on IS50,000 bail

By ROBERT ROSENBERG
Jerusalem Post Reporter

One of the three suspects in the Temple Mount sabotage bid case, was released Friday on IS50,000 bail. He is forbidden to go anywhere except home and to work.

He is Rafi Hen, a Jaffa shopowner, who was arrested as a suspected financier of the Bnei Yehuda cult that allegedly plotted the sabotage of the Temple Mount mosques.

The Jerusalem Post has learned that Hen's cooperation with the police — and their hopes that he will help them find missing suspect Shimon Barda — prompted their agreement for his release.

But the police are still considering filing criminal charges against him for his involvement with the cult, two of whose members grew up with him in a Holon neighborhood.

The other two suspects in police custody meanwhile continue to cooperate with the police, but The Post has learned that they have not yet actually signed a confession.

Arguing that confession is contrary to their religious beliefs, they instead have shown police detectives how the sabotage attempt on the al-Aksa mosque was made.

Nahal to be honoured with Israel Prize

The Nahal will be awarded the 5744-1984 Israel Prize for a special contribution to the country and its society, the Ministry of Education and Culture announced.

Israel Prizes in various fields are awarded on Independence Day.

The panel recommending this praised the Nahal as an "exemplar of Zionist fulfillment." The judges said the Nahal members have served the cause of security and settlement through their fighting missions in the Israel Defence Forces and their work on settlements and outposts across the country.

Some 2,800 Nahal groups have been set up since the first group was established in September 1948 by order of the chief of staff. The Nahal has set up 120 outposts and more than 50 settlements, and has helped strengthen 170 others.

ordered a full alert after the intruding warplane dropped five bombs on Omdurman, a city of 300,000 people across the Nile River from Khartoum, at 11:30 a.m. (0930 GMT) on Friday.

Five Sudanese were killed and two wounded, according to Badreddin Soleiman, first secretary of the Sudanese Socialist Union, the only authorized political party headed by Numeiri.

Eyewitnesses said the bombs hit an empty school, two houses, a park overlooking the Nile and an administrative building of the Omdurman Broadcasting Station, the official radio.

There were no casualties at the school as it was closed on Friday, witnesses said.

A Sudan foreign ministry statement late Friday said the government had "clear proof" that the aircraft took off from and returned to a Libyan air base at Kufra Oasis, 1,360 kilometres northwest of Khartoum.

and close to the meeting point of the Sudanese, Libyan and Egyptian borders.

Mubarak said Numeiri phoned him Friday and "he told me about this raid by a Tupolev-22 which is only owned by Libya."

Mubarak said that two days ago he received a message from Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi proposing that Egypt and Libya reopen their common border, closed since a 1977 war between them, and strive for a merger.

Mubarak said this was "the fourth or fifth" such overture by Gaddafi since Mubarak took office in October 1981, and every time this happened it was followed by some hostile Libyan action.

"Whenever I hear this (such overtures), I realize that something is cooking," Mubarak said. This time, he added, "I heard about this small raid. Unbelievable."

"We are taking some measures and I think it is better to wait and see," Mubarak said.

ing peace to the war-torn country and for a more just division of government authority between the Christians and Moslems. The document also reportedly contains proposals for security arrangements with Israel in south Lebanon.

Israel government circles said last night that the government was in principle prepared to negotiate any sensible future course, but they were sceptical whether Jemayel could "deliver anything at all."

The Jerusalem Post was told that the government is convinced that Jemayel has absolutely no intention of sending forces south, or of making any military commitment that could assuage Israel's security fears.

The circles think that at most Jemayel might send an officer to take command of the late Major Sa'ad Hadad's South Lebanese militias — a gesture considered insufficient by Israel.

Several Lausanne conference sources said both sides remained divided over the extent of secularization of key government posts.

Conference sources said that the conferees had agreed to stick to the 1943 National Pact under which presidents were elected from the Maronite Christian community, while the premiership went to the Sunni Moslems and the presidency of the 99-seat parliament to the Shi'ite Moslems.

But Christian leaders have refused a demand by the opposition for abolishing the traditional allocation of other key public offices on confessional bases, especially that of the army command and other senior security and political posts.

In Beirut, each side blamed the other for the latest violations of the truce along the Green Line that divides the capital into Moslem and Christian sectors, in the Shiite southern suburbs and in the Druse-inhabited hills east of the city.

The Palestinian Gaza Hospital in the Palestinian refugee camp of Sabra, south of Beirut, said seven persons were killed and five wounded when the camp and surrounding area were shelled yesterday evening. The casualties included both Palestinian refugees and Lebanese residents.

The shelling in the camp area and in East Beirut was the first on residential areas since the Tuesday cease-fire.

The sound of crashing shells and machinegun fire echoed through the city throughout the night into the early morning hours yesterday. The fighting slackened at mid-morning, but police said sporadic grenade blasts were heard in the downtown commercial district.

Brazil will purchase missiles from Israel

RIO DE JANEIRO (AFP). — The Brazilian fleet is to purchase Israeli Gabriel sea-to-sea missiles. This was announced by Admiralty Minister Maximiliano de Fozes, who also said his navy would buy French Exocet and Italian Autocat missiles.

Brazilian manufacturers of military equipment have complained that the purchase of Israeli weapons could harm Brazil's exports to other Middle East countries, notably Iraq.

Mubarak: U.S. embassy move to Jerusalem 'disastrous'

CAIRO (AP). — Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak has sent a letter to President Ronald Reagan warning of "disastrous" consequences if the U.S. moves its embassy in Israel to Jerusalem, a Cairo newspaper said in its Friday edition.

An editorial by Al-Ahram editor-in-chief Ibrahim Nafeh, known to be close to Mubarak, called on Arab and Islamic countries to adopt a unified stance in opposing proposed congressional legislation which would require the U.S. to switch its embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

The article is the latest in a string of vitriolic attacks in Egypt's news media against the proposed embassy transfer.

"Egypt has felt the danger of what is currently happening in the corridors of Congress," Nafeh wrote. He said that Mubarak had sent an "urgent letter" to Reagan and Secretary of State George Schultz.

The article revealed that a meeting this week between Foreign Minister Kamel Hassan Ali and U.S. ambassador to Cairo Nicholas Veliotes discussed the proposed legislation, and quoted Ali as pressing a "personal view" that its passage would "blow up" all efforts for peace in the Middle East.

Al-Ahram also said that Reagan had already become a "prisoner" of the election campaign and the Arabs face the prospect of their conflict with Israel being shelved indefinitely by the U.S.

The paper blamed the Arabs for failing to support Reagan's Middle East peace initiative of September 1, 1982.

As a result of progress made by Democratic presidential hopeful Senator Gary Hart, the newspaper said, "Fear has begun to haunt President Reagan."

Al-Ahram recalled repeated warnings by Mubarak that unless the Arabs supported the Reagan initiative, a settlement with Israel would be delayed for a long time.

Soviet peace group here

Jerusalem Post Staff

TEL AVIV. — The hope that the present visit of a delegation representing the Soviet Peace Committee will lead to better Israeli-Soviet ties was voiced on Friday night by Knesset member Ora Namir. She was speaking at a reception for the four guests sponsored by a public committee consisting of representatives of Israeli peace movements, of the Labour Party, Mapam, Rakah, Sheli and Alternativa (a party of Sheli breakaways).

Namir called for the renewal of diplomatic relations between the two countries and for Soviet Jews to be permitted to immigrate to Israel and "to study their language — Hebrew."

In reply, the head of the Russian delegation, Yuri Barbas, said the renewal of ties depends on Israel's first changing its "dangerous" policies. As for the Hebrew language, "if Soviet Jews have a mother tongue at all, it is Yiddish and in this language there are newspapers, books, a theatre and artistic activities," he said. Furthermore, he claimed, the study of Hebrew is not forbidden in the Soviet Union. It is studied in universities in Moscow and Leningrad and in foreign-language institutes.

The delegation yesterday visited Yaf Hanna and Taiba village near Tulkarm.

The delegation arrived by air on Friday, via Bucharest, at the invitation of the Israeli committee. Barbas is editor of Sovetskaya Kultura (Soviet Culture) and head of the Soviet People's Committee for Solidarity with the Palestinians.

The delegation's other three members are: Yuri Drozdov, responsible for Middle East affairs in the Soviet peace committee; Alexander Krasnov, head of the Novosti news agency's African and Middle Eastern Department; and Dr. Wilhelm Gruner.

The visitors were met at the Ben-Gurion Airport by Knesset Member Tawfik Toubi (Democratic Front for Peace and Equality).

"We hope our visit will lead to progress in the search for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East," Barbas told a Kol Yisrael radio interviewer on Friday. Krasnov said the group would not visit the West Bank or the Gaza District. (Itim).

SYRIA WILL PRESS

Alawites will quickly be exploited by the majority Sunnis to try to oust them from power.

By appointing Rifaa't a vice-president, the president has ostensibly elevated his brother. But he, may have clipped Rifaa't's wings at the same time, if the younger man has indeed lost his hold on the "Defence Companies" or if they are now to be incorporated in the regular army.

Similarly, while keeping Rifaa't "in the running," the president has carefully maintained the rank and role of other, Sunni, key-men in the regime: Kaddam is the senior vice-president; General Mustafa Tlass stays on as defence minister and becomes deputy premier too; and Gen. Shehadi, Rifaa't's particular foe, remains as chief of staff.

Indeed, Shehadi's son is soon to marry the president's daughter in a rare Sunni-Alawite nuptial bond that will draw their respective fathers even closer together.

Another key figure in the regime, who hitherto, has kept in the background, came forward at the height of the crisis a fortnight ago to restore harmony. This was Hafez and Rifaa't Assad's mother.

According to reliable sources, the elderly matriarch emerged from her family stronghold, the village of Karadacha near Latakia, to make peace between her two sons. She was present at the crucial meeting in Damascus at the end of February, held shortly after shots were fired by rival forces in the proximity of the presidential palace.

pects moves towards a settlement of the Lebanese problem before real progress can be expected regarding the administered areas.

Asked about possible Syrian objections to a Jordanian-Palestinian dialogue with Israel, Ghali said he believed the two parties could be brought to the negotiating table without a tacit Syrian agreement on the matter.

Israeli-Egyptian relations, said Ghali, would improve only if there was a new momentum towards a comprehensive peace in the region.

Meanwhile, the Kuwaiti newspaper Al-Kabab said on Friday that a Syrian-Egyptian rapprochement was in the offing, saying Cairo was preparing to dump the U.S.

sponsored Camp David frameworks for peace with Israel.

The independent newspaper quoted unidentified Syrian officials as saying that Egyptian presidential aide Osama al-Baz visited Damascus secretly in recent weeks to negotiate a purported deal whereby Egypt would drop the accords in return for Arab political and financial support.

Last week, the Sharjah-based radical newspaper Al-Khaleej also claimed al-Baz visited Damascus for similar discussions in the wake of Lebanon's abrogation of its May troop withdrawal agreement with Israel.

In Cairo, Egyptian officials rejected the newspaper reports as "nonsense."

Brazil court probing Israeli 'baby trade'

RIO DE JANEIRO (AFP). — A Brazilian court has formally opened an investigation of the "baby trade" with Israel, which according to a Brazilian source involves some 20 babies a month. Each Brazilian baby is sold to Israeli buyers for about $3,200, said the source.

The court investigation was prompted by a Rio newspaper report that said that 19 Brazilian babies were sold to Israelis in February, and thousands of Brazilian adults were on a waiting list to adopt children.

The newspaper said that a woman lawyer was running the operation and that she was in contact with a local maternity hospital.

The newspaper reported that a Tel Aviv travel agency was offering a package deal costing $7,500 and including a round trip to Brazil, a stay in a hotel, buying the baby and its registration in a passport, all within 30 days.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS

"The Bible has fascinated me since childhood. I have always thought of it as the greatest source of poetry of all times. I have sought its reflection in life, and in art. The Bible is like a reverberation of nature and it is this mystery I have tried to convey." — Marc Chagall.

The message of the Bible deserves a special status in Chagall's work — as a reflection of his oeuvre and of painting in general, and from the light it sheds on man.

Country gears up for Purim entertainments

Jerusalem Post Staff
Jerusalem and other cities that were walled in the time of Joshua will celebrate Purim tonight and tomorrow, Shushan Purim, while the rest of the country is recovering from last night's and today's celebrations.

The Jerusalem Municipality has prepared dozens of events to cheer up residents, the biggest being the "Pur-Shalom" festival in the Ben-Yehuda Mall, tomorrow between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. The mall has been decorated by Bezalel art students, and dozens of entertainers will be on hand. Jerusalem hotels have set up stands where they will sell refreshments at special rates. Performing clowns will stroll up and down the mall.

In addition, community centres around the city, as well as the Jewish Agency's and Absorption Ministry's absorption centres for new olim will have Purim parties.

The municipal sports amphitheatre in the Kiryat Hayovel quarter will hold special events for the children of Jerusalem policemen. The Liberty Bell Garden will be open on Shushan Purim for rollerskating and special events.

Habad hassidim have prepared 150,000 Purim parcels for distribution to war orphans, soldiers, the ill, prisoners and new olim. Habadniks will visit soldiers at installations in Israel and in Lebanon during Purim. Habad women have undertaken to visit the homes of 2,500 bereaved families and bring them Purim parcels.

A group of new olim is throwing a gala Purim party for the children of Alyn Hospital for the handicapped in Jerusalem tomorrow morning. The festivities will include games, a costume competition and plenty of soft drinks and hamantaschen.

In Tel Aviv, schoolchildren from the A.D. Gordon and Graetz elementary schools took over Sderot Ben-Gurion on Friday morning and treated passersby to a colourful Purim carnival of song and dance. In the stretch closest to Rehov Dizengoff, a class of Graetz pupils costumed as the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra pantomimed a symphony performance to appropriate background music.

The Sheraton and Dan hotels in Tel Aviv will hold a "Purim" today between 10 a.m. and 1 p.m. along the city's boardwalk in which clowns will entertain passersby.

Smurfs (Dardassim) will take a leading role in Haifa's annual "Archiparchitura" Purim parade to be held in the Hadar quarter this afternoon.

Dozens of floats with giant model dolls — many of them depicting characters from the popular television cartoon series — will participate. There will also be dance groups, clowns, cyclists, youth entertainment groups and many others.

The procession will start from the old Technion campus in Hadar at 4 p.m. and will wind its way through central parts of the quarter, including Herzl and Hehalutz streets, before returning to the Technion campus for the costume competition and prize-giving.

The event is being organised by the municipal education and culture department and students from the Technion's architecture department. A comic football match between the students and municipal councillors at the municipal Memorial Park is due to take place before the parade.

Superboy and other costumed pupils from the Attias school in Jerusalem's East Talpiaz quarter set out on a Purim parade on Friday. (Scoop 80)

Bus fares go up by 40 per cent

Jerusalem Post Staff
Bus fares go up this morning by 40 per cent and taxi fares go up by 20 per cent, the Transport Ministry announced yesterday.

In making the announcement, the ministry said that all future fare increases will be linked directly to general cost-of-living increases.

Holders of urban multiple bus tickets will be able to continue to use them without extra charge for a fortnight.

Urban bus rides will now cost IS35 (instead of the current IS25 fare).

Bus travel from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv will cost IS280 (instead of IS200).

The new Tel Aviv-Haifa fare is IS350 (instead of IS250) and the Jerusalem-Haifa fare is now IS610 (IS440). The Tel Aviv-Beersheba ride costs IS350 (IS250). The Jerusalem-Beersheba fare is IS430 (IS310).

Inter-urban travel for soldiers will cost IS51 (IS36) per ticket.

Tel Aviv sherut taxis plying the number 4 route will now charge IS43 and a ride on the number 5 sherut route will be IS52.

The Jerusalem-Tel Aviv sherut ride now costs IS370.

Phalange spokesman says

'Cantons sole solution'

By LEA LEVAVI
Jerusalem Post Reporter
The only solution to Lebanon's problems is cantonization, Pierre Yazbek, a representative of the Phalange-dominated Lebanese Forces, told Kol Yisrael Radio yesterday. "What is happening in Lebanon will not create a solution," he said. "The federation of communities in Lebanon exists in fact and it must also be recognized by law. There has to be a Christian autonomous area or canton, a Druse area and a Shi'ite area," he said.

Israel can help, by seeing to the establishment of a Druse canton in the Shouf and warning Syria that an encroachment will not be tolerated, Yazbek said. Israel can also help Shi'ite leader Nabih Berri prevent the Syrians from infiltrating pro-Homani Shi'ites into Southern Lebanon.

On the same programme, Minister without Portfolio Sarah Doron said now is not the time for the cabinet to make decisions about redeploying the Israel Defence Forces in Lebanon because the situation there is fluid and there may be new developments as a result of the Lausanne conference. "We are a people of armchair generals," she said. "Everyone wants to give advice, but the decisions must be based on what the military advises," she said.

The programme also looked at the Lebanese Army in Southern Lebanon and its ability to prevent terrorists from infiltrating into the area near Israel's northern border. Each of the 2,000 soldiers in the Lebanese Army receives LP1400 (IS37,000) a month from Israel, which amounts to IS9 million a year, it was said. The army's growth depends on the extent of Israel's aid.

The soldiers in the Lebanese Army in Southern Lebanon come from all religious communities and so far seem able to work together. A Shi'ite officer told an Israel Radio reporter he had no inhibitions about shooting at fellow Shi'ites who had ambushed his men. "A bullet causes wounds no matter who fires it," he said, "and they were shooting at civilians."

Bus-shooting suspect sees lawyer

By ROBERT ROSENBERG
Jerusalem Post Reporter

Only one of the five suspects in the Ramallah bus-shooting incident is not cooperating with the police, according to police sources. On Friday the recalcitrant suspect was permitted to meet with his lawyer, the first and only one to do so.

The man, Yehuda Richter, a Kach movement activist who "commanded" the Yarmut suicide bunker, met for about 20 minutes with Meir Shechter, the lawyer hired by Kach leader Meir Kahane to defend the five suspects in the case.

Richter told Shechter that he, Richter, had not told the police anything, the lawyer told reporters. The lawyer said that all five suspects are being kept in separate cells in the Russian Compound in Jerusalem, and are being interrogated separately.

The Jerusalem Post has learned that the four suspects cooperating with the police have each provided "versions" of the events regarding the bus shooting, as well as answered questions about other incidents in which they were allegedly involved.

The police refuse to confirm reports that one of the suspects has agreed to become a state's witness.

Meanwhile, Kahane — whose passport has been given by the police to Shechter for safekeeping to prevent the Kach leader's departure from the country — was questioned on Friday and will be questioned again today.

The police as yet have no reason to connect him directly to the bus shooting incident, in which seven persons were wounded. But they are interested in his explanation about whether his ideology and rhetoric may have encouraged his supporters to act.

'Knesset not conducive to polite debate'

Jerusalem Post Reporter
It is unrealistic to expect elegant debate in the Knesset because of the nature of the problems discussed and because the two political camps are equal in strength and polarized, Knesset Member Yair Tsaaban (Alignment-Mapam) said in a radio interview Friday evening.

Tsaaban was interviewed on Kol Yisrael radio after receiving a prize for good manners from Israel's parliamentary reporters.

He said the one person he had ever attacked personally from the Knesset rostrum is Minister without Portfolio Ariel Sharon. "I believe in opposing opinions and not the person who holds them," he said. "But when the person in question breaks the democratic rules and ignores moral principles, it is not enough to speak against his opinions."

Tsaaban called for teaching the country that decisions must be made democratically. The minority, he said, must accept the majority decision, but without giving up its right and duty to keep fighting for the acceptance of its own view.

He said that the government tends to undermine the importance of the Knesset. "I'm not saying that other Knesset members don't contribute to the Knesset's poor public image," he said. "But the government takes the lead."

Uzan wants more authority for Absorption Ministry

By LEA LEVAVI
Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — If the Absorption Ministry does not have its own development budget for housing, authority to deal with the problems of olim without being dependent on other ministries, and a clear division of labour with Jewish Agency, then the ministry has no right to exist, Absorption Minister Aharon Uzan told the Histadrut Absorption Council on Thursday.

Uzan was present only for a short part of the three-hour meeting, but the few speakers whom he did hear made it clear that the problem of greatest concern to those who work with new olim is housing. In response, Uzan said that for Western olim who have professions or skilled trades, the best solution is for them to take a mortgage and buy their own apartment, using the rent subsidy (available for up to three years) until they decide where they want to settle.

Uzan also said he intends to suggest to the Ministerial Economic Committee that dismissals should not affect new olim. "The Histadrut cannot change the 'last hired, first fired' rule, but the government can require that olim be the exception," he said.

Yitzhak Barkai, chairman of the Histadrut's Absorption and Development Department, complained that the government is indifferent to olim and absorption and that the public follows the government's lead.

"Everyone says there is no olim, but 16,500 olim came in 1983," Representatives of the settlers' associations left the hall during Uzan's speech because, they said, they are tired of talking and promises and want action, particularly in solving housing problems.

Another arrest in Haifa murder case

ACRE. — Another suspect has been arrested in connection with the murder of 15-year-old Danny Kaz of Haifa four months ago.

The suspect, from the Central Galilee village of Sakhnin, is reportedly a brother of another village resident who was arrested over two weeks ago. The wife of one of the brothers has meanwhile been released.

Telephone charges up by 28.7 per cent

Jerusalem Post Staff
Local telephone and telegram rates will go up today by 28.7 per cent, the Communications Ministry announced on Friday.

International telephone and telex charges will go up by 10 per cent, in accordance with the rate of devaluation of the shekel.

Traffic delays due to TA marathon

Jerusalem Post Staff
Tomorrow's Tel Aviv Marathon will cause delays in traffic along Ibn-Gvirol, Yehuda Halevi, Dizengoff, Jabotinsky, Yirmiyahu, Bnei Dan, Levi Eshkol, Bnei Ephraim, Abba Hillel, Bialik, Pinkas, Rothschild and Rokach streets and on the Halacha Bridge between 9 a.m. and 3 p.m., the police announced.

They asked the public coming by car into the city to plan their route of entry accordingly.

Rothschild Hospital shutdown deferred

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Reporter

HAIFA. — The staff of the Rothschild Hospital have decided to postpone their threatened phased shutdown of the hospital, scheduled to begin today, at the request of Knesset Labour and Social Affairs Committee chairman Menahem Porush.

Porush had asked the 1,300 workers to defer their proposed action pending his investigation of their demands that the Health Ministry continue funding the hospital's partially completed west wing project.

In a telegram to the staff, Porush said that closing the hospital would jeopardize the lives of patients.

The staff had earlier warned that they would shut the hospital by April. The phased closure was to have begun today with the shutting of the outpatients department, refusing to admit patients for elective treatments, and starting to discharge patients.

Weekly weather forecasts to start in fall

Jerusalem Post Reporter
BEIT DAKAN. — The Meteorological Institute plans to start giving weekly weather forecasts starting next autumn, director Julius Kessler said last week.

Kessler said that meteorologists are also working on monthly forecasts, but it is still too early to say when these would be available. Kessler mentioned this in response to a remark by President Chaim Herzog, who visited the institute. Herzog had communicated that he had seen such monthly weather forecasts on visits abroad.

The country lags behind other nations in making such forecasts, because it lacks funds, modern equipment and manpower, meteorological sources said.

Yehuda Tokatly, director of the Meteorological Service, told the president that the institute has 80 stations all over the country that collect weather data, plus more than 400 stations, operated by volunteers, that collect information on rainfall.

Professor Avraham Gagim, chairman of the Hebrew University's department of atmospheric sciences and head of the rain-seeding project it carries out with the institute, the Water Commission and Mekorot, told the president that foreign experts cite Israel's project as one of the most successful in the world.

Gagim estimates that the project has increased rainfall by at least 15 per cent, adding between 100 and 150 million cubic metres of water to the Kinneret. This is worth annually about $15 million, while the project costs only about $800,000 per year, he said.

Human-rights legal group established in areas

By LEA LEVAVI
Jerusalem Post Reporter

"Law in the Service of Man," an organization to promote human rights and the rule of law in the administered territories, has been established by three Ramallah lawyers. Kol Yisrael radio reported yesterday.

The founder, Raja Shehadeh, got the idea while studying law in London, where he is active in a local human rights organization. When he returned to Ramallah, he was joined by Jonathan Kuttub, who had been trained in the U.S., and a woman lawyer, Muna Rashbawi, who had studied in Cairo.

Rashbawi has published two booklets, one on the rights of prisoners and another on how to protect land rights. She also publishes a weekly column on legal matters in the Jerusalem Arabic newspaper Al-Fajr.

A SMALL laboratory on the second floor of the Haifa University's Eshkol Tower has become a shrine to English-born mathematician Marie Kuper.

The shelves lining the walls and the filing cabinets are stacked with the results of her labour — thousands of innovative games, diagrams and textbooks, all designed with the single aim of encouraging children to understand and love mathematical concepts.

Marie Kuper spent five years collecting teaching aids and books from all over the world and devised many of her own. She also instilled her driving passion for the subject in teachers and youngsters.

The university has established a special fund to perpetuate her memory. Marie Kuper died of a heart attack on February 4, while taking a group of leading Israeli educationalists in maths on a study tour of her native England. She was 60.

Her husband, Prof. Charles Kuper, is a member of the Technion's physics department. A son, Gabriel, is completing his Ph.D. in computer studies at Stanford University, a daughter, Tsipi, is a journalist.

The fund was launched March 12 at a memorial service at the university, attended by more than 100 colleagues and friends. The fund will be used to ensure that the work Marie Kuper started will be continued.

"She was a character in the true sense of the word," says Prof. Parda Neshet, dean of the university's school of education. "She had the energy of five people. We can't even find five people who can cover the same amount of work."

The Kupers settled in Israel 16 years ago. Marie brought with her a bachelor of science degree with honours in mathematics from the University of Wales. She had taught at high schools in Liverpool and at the St. Leonards School for Girls, in St. Andrews Scotland.

A maths memorial

A Haifa University laboratory filled with innovative games and books is a permanent memorial to mathematician Marie Kuper, writes David Rudge.

Marie Kuper

From 1971 to 1976, she was head of the maths department at Haifa's Neve Sha'anun high school. During that period she became a curriculum writer/researcher/examiner for the Education Ministry, a job she held until her death.

IN THE COURSE of her work for the Education Ministry, she helped design and write a new series of maths textbooks, which are now being used in primary schools.

"Marie was part of a nationwide team that set the curriculum for youngsters. The books are considered to be among the best of their kind in the world. She concentrated on the presentation of geometry, which was her specialist subject," says Professor Neshet.

"She collected and collated ideas and teaching aids from all over the world, modified them and, in many cases, translated them into Hebrew. She also invented thousands of games for teachers to use to motivate and encourage youngsters in their study of mathematics. She brought in all the materials for the various games and models — bits of cardboard or plastic discs which she got from factories and workshops. She knew every place in Haifa where she could get these materials, and did this by herself," notes Professor Neshet. Teachers could come into the laboratory and pick out what they wanted.

"Marie Kuper's approach to teaching was often very informal and this was evident in the innovative techniques she devised," she adds. "She believed the only way to really test a new game, model or teaching technique was with those who would eventually use it — the children themselves."

"Marie would travel half of Israel if she thought she could contribute something. For instance, if a teacher was unsure about the use of a particular model or game, Marie would simply go to the school and explain it."

"She had the ability, like all really good teachers, of drawing the best out of her students, whether they were teachers themselves or children. It was a testament to her skill and dedication that following her visits to schools to try out one of her ideas, the children would always ask when she was coming back."

She also got the Education Ministry to sponsor weekly visits to her lab by teachers from Ma'alot, who were ferried to and from the university by taxi.

"Many teachers used to come after school hours," said Professor Neshet, "which was a measure of the respect they had for Marie and her work. They literally came from all parts of the country to study the new techniques and take the relevant materials back with them."

MARIE KUPER's research work at the laboratory was also directed to another target — helping less gifted children.

"Maths is not considered to be one of the most popular subjects taught in schools, but Marie believed that all children could come to love and understand the subject, given the right stimuli," says Neshet.

"Once a week she would take part in classes at one of the primary schools in Tirat Carmel to assist teachers there in promoting mathematics. She was so creative that she would always find an easier way of presenting a particular subject."

Busy as she was, Marie Kuper completed a masters degree in education in 1979, wrote for international journals and lectured at the Oranim teachers training college in Tivon. To relax, she embroidered, made rugs and did other handicrafts. The walls and floors of her home display the success of her efforts.

"Among the thousands of games, models and designs stored in the lab, there are probably several that could have been commercial successes like Rubik's cube," says Professor Neshet. "But she wasn't interested in commercial success for herself. Her sole aim was to help the children of Israel to grasp and enjoy mathematical concepts and to that end she devoted her life."

"KEEP HANDS off exhibits," neatly painted signs warn people in museums all over the world. "Please don't touch!" Now, for once, the signs are going to say, "Please touch!" — at the Children's Discovery Museum of Beit Shemesh, due to open within the next few weeks.

Nicknamed the "chief wizard" of the museum, director Shmuel Deitel is finalizing plans and seeking additional funds — he has already received seed money from the Educational Endowment Fund, an international foundation, and from personal contributions — for what he hopes will be a prototype for children's museums throughout Israel and the Third World.

"The idea for this museum for pre-school-aged children — and ours will be the first in Israel — originated in museums in Indianapolis and Chicago where there is an emphasis on what is called 'hands-on' education."

"This is something I am very interested in," says the enterprising Deitel, who has a master's degree in early childhood development and has worked with underprivileged children in the U.S. and in Israel.

"The hands-on idea is based on the theories of developmental psychologist Jean Piaget, who believed that a child learns by doing. There is no substitute for experience, especially for a pre-school child from age three to six," explains the 28-year-old former New Yorker, who immigrated to Israel last year.

"In this country the educational system is not based on children's exploration or interaction, but on repetition," says Deitel. "Educators are slowly becoming aware of this, however, and things are changing."

Recent statistics show that less than 15 per cent of Israeli high school students choose science as their future field of study. This, he notes, "shows that in their early years, an appreciation and interest in experimentation and active learning is not instilled in them. That's not good for the students — or for the future of the state."

Deitel says that a large, unused room at a Beit Shemesh primary school, given to him by the municipality, will be the site for the pre-school museum.

Sound, light, force and motion are the key elements to be incorporated in the hands-on exhibits: "The aim is to let the child see the relationships between these things and the connection they have with real life, whether we're talking about child-sized traffic lights, draw bridges, cranes, or scales with teddy bears and blocks as weights."

In learning by the hands-on process, the child needs guidance, stresses Deitel, but doesn't "need to be watched over and smothered. The child can play alone with, let's say, lights of different colours, and he mixes them, immediately seeing results. Playing with hands-on games gives the child a concept of cause and effect, and makes him feel in control and independent."

The hands-on museum idea has excited both local educators and officials at the Ministry of Education, in addition to many Beit Shemesh residents who have become actively involved in planning, designing and constructing exhibits and in publicising the museum. Residents of the town will also serve on the museum's advisory board.

"The town is really getting behind this and it is exciting," says Deitel. "The museum will be established for small children — there are about 1,250 pre-schoolers in Beit Shemesh — as well as for their families and teachers. We will expand later to include first- and second-graders. I hope to develop an outreach programme for parents who will be invited to watch video tapes of their children playing with the exhibits and to discuss their activities."

"Also, there will hopefully be special workshops for teachers to show them certain games and hands-on concepts that can be applied in the classroom. Applying the concepts will both free the teacher from giving constant attention to the pupils, and will help improve their cognitive development," he notes.

When the museum opens, staff members will visit pre-school classrooms and demonstrate some hands-on games, says Deitel, and staff will also be on hand to help the children and ask them questions when they come to visit.

The museum director, who is getting a part-time salary from Project Renewal, says he hopes that the museum will have a long-term impact in Beit Shemesh and, eventually, elsewhere in Israel — especially in development towns.

"Adopting this kind of a community-oriented programme — the museum and outreach aspects included — helps such towns develop a sense of civic pride," Deitel says. "It helps the educational system and the town's self-image."

"For now, my goal is to generate interest and convince local and international institutions to donate money and materials for the museum and towards further hands-on education programmes like it around Israel." (Presently, Save the Children in Jerusalem is accepting tax-deductible contributions to the Beit Shemesh Children's Museum — 17 Rashba St., POB 7682.)

Eventually, Deitel hopes to work out an exchange programme with the well-known children's museum in Indianapolis — Beit Shemesh's Project Renewal "twin" city, which has shown great interest in the museum here.

Deitel believes that hands-on education, tailored to the social and cultural backgrounds of the youngsters, is a necessity. It is an educational concept that can be used, he stresses, in developing countries' school systems, at very little expense and with great results.

"The world dulls children's senses by telling them not to do, not to touch," he asserts. "Yet it is through the stimulation of the senses — through doing and touching — that their cognitive development is best improved."

PLACEBOS — mock medicines that contain no active ingredients — create the same side effects as the medicines they imitate.

This conclusion was recently reported by West German Prof. Uwe Fricke, of Cologne University's Pharmacology Department, based on a study he conducted.

Placebos have been found not only to have considerable curative effect, but in 30 to 40 per cent of cases, they also have side effects," he reported in the German Pharmacology Monthly.

Placebos are sometimes prescribed to humour or gratify a patient, but are mostly used as part of the procedure of testing new drugs before they are licensed. Test groups are given the new drug while a control group is given placebos.

It had been generally assumed that because a placebo has no pharmacologically active properties, it should have no side effects.

But Fricke asserts "the percentage of side effects of placebos is just as high as with bona fide drugs." Patients undergoing placebo therapy "complain particularly about trouble with the central nervous system, such as feelings of numbness, tiredness or headaches. They also complain about stomach and intestine trouble."

Health briefs

Fricke found that patients' complaints vary in accordance with their illness and the kind of drug the placebo "imitates."

"In trials of a new drug to treat depression, typical side-effects — dryness of the mouth and constipation — were reported by both groups," he found.

He asserted that patients "have even been found to become addicted to placebos."

The only after-effects not yet reported, he said, are death or life-endangering complications.

ISRAELI doctors who practise homeopathy, acupuncture and auriculomedicine have banded together to form an association designed to foster acceptance of these non-conventional practices by the Israeli medical establishment.

"No hospital administrator who wants to keep his good name will allow me to practise homeopathy during my workday at the hospital," Dr. Menahem Auberbaum explained at a recent press conference in Tel Aviv. "It is not illegal for me to practise homeopathy privately, since I am an M.D., but I am not allowed to write the word 'homeopathy' on my sign. In other countries, the techniques we represent are called 'alternative medicine,' but we do not think of ourselves as an alternative. We want to complement conventional medicine, not fight it."

Homeopathy involves the administration of very small doses of drugs in order to cure diseases where the same drug — if administered in large doses or high concentrations — would itself cause symptoms similar to those of the disease. For example, arsenic can cause type of diarrhea similar to that suffered by cholera patients, but an infinitesimal amount of arsenic can cure this diarrhea.

Auriculomedicine is a specialized form of acupuncture, done only in the ear.

The doctors at the press conference credited each of the three practices with being more helpful to asthmatics, ulcer sufferers and neuralgia victims than the remedies offered for these ailments by conventional medicine. These practices can also alleviate the pain of cancer without the use of drugs, though all the doctors hastened to disclaim any ability to cure the cancer itself.

"No responsible doctor would treat tumours by these means," Auberbaum explained, "and if you come to me complaining of stomach pains, I would not treat you homeopathically until I had the results of a conventional examination."

The only one of these procedures which has received even grudging acceptance from the Ministry of Health is acupuncture, but only on condition that conventional medical practitioners always get the first try with the patient.

The strike of hospital staffs is the first rumblings of a bigger struggle that looms. At the end of the present month the collective agreement between the Histadrut and the Coordinating Committee of Employer Organizations comes up for renewal. The Histadrut's key antagonist this time is not the employers but the Treasury. What stand is Finance Minister Yigal Cohen-Orgad going to take?

His aim is to undo the damage perpetrated by his predecessor Yoram Aridor. He wants during the present year to reduce the level of inflation and the size of the trade deficit back to the situation prevailing before Aridor took over. A modest objective, but essential as stage one in the drive for solving Israel's economic problems.

How to achieve that aim? Two ways, one of them by cutting the estimates. The National Budget for 1984 reveals that the intention is to reduce defence expenditure by 7.5 per cent, and outlay on the social services by 5 per cent.

Even that is impossible without the Treasury's second economy measure: diminishing wages. All wages will be affected — government officials too. The savings in civil-service wages makes an important contribution to the budget-trimming exercise that Cohen-Orgad has in mind.

The official economic blueprint attributes the latest worsening of inflation to measures taken recently for improving Israel foreign trade (the reference is presumably to accelerated devaluations). The

Cohen-Orgad's looming fight with the Histadrut

How the economic cards are stacked

Treasury's aim is now to reduce the pace of inflation back to where it was before this latest outburst, that is back from the 190 per cent of 1983 to the 130 per cent of 1982.

As to the trade deficit, this has grown so large that a big effort is needed to make a relatively modest dent in it. If we confine our attention to civilian trade — excluding that is, both defence imports (largely financed by the U.S. government) and the cost of servicing the foreign debt — we have the duty of slashing the deficit this year from $3,255 million to $2,190m., a cut of over $1 billion, or one-third.

We have to do that because the burden of Israel's massive dollar debt is getting heavier year by year. If we manage to save the $1b. of foreign currency on the trading side, we shall only have reduced the total civilian deficit, including debt service (together a monstrous $4,570m.) by $830m., or less than 20 per cent. And that is without counting defence imports.

THE TASK cannot be accomplished unless wages are lowered, official planners make the point clear. By how much? The National Budget declares bluntly: by enough to restore the level prevailing in 1982. That means cutting 1983 salaries by 9 per cent.

There has been an erosion of wages already, due to accelerated inflation during the last quarter of 1983, but there have also been cost-of-living allowances; and the employers agreed last week to grant an 8 per cent erosion allowance on top of that.

The adjustments make up some of the ground, but not all. According to Treasury sources the lag in wages, compared with the level reached last year, is still, after all the compensations paid, a solid 12 per cent.

The negotiating process is however not terminated. The Histadrut is holding something in reserve for the next bout of wage bargaining. This will be over the collective agreement to cover the next two years, from April 1 to March 31, 1986.

HOW ARE THE cards stacked?

Talks have not started yet. By the time they get under way, salaries will have been eroded further by the spell of inflation during the last two months. Assuming this comes to 20 per cent, then a new labour contract providing for a salary increase of up to 23 per cent (including provision for the cost of living) will still permit the targets of the national economic plan to be fulfilled. Anything above that should upset the apple-cart.

Well, what will happen if the apple-cart is upset? Here we come to the main argument of Cohen-Orgad. Suppose that a well-disciplined and patriotic trade union movement allows real wages to drop by 9 per cent, back to the scale in force two years ago. That will be a triumph for the politics of consensus. But unemployment will still go up.

The National Budget observes that the only thing which is allowed to go up in 1984 is exports. That is not quite true. Another important item due for increase is the size of the population. Last year the number of inhabitants grew by 78,000, this year it should expand by another 82,000.

Of last year's increase, 58,000 were Jews, which should put paid to the idea that emigration erodes the size of the Jewish population in Israel. The civilian labour force is predicted to increase by 21,000 over last year's total of 1,402,000.

Unfortunately, the number in employment will drop by 10,000. If the number of work-seekers is up by 21,000 and the number of jobs goes down by 10,000, the number of unemployed will augment by around 30,000. That increase will be painful.

That is if the trade unions do what Cohen-Orgad tells them and comply with the provisions of the nation's economic plan. But suppose they don't? Suppose they demand full compensation for wage erosion and possibly a little more — a 5 or 10 per cent increase in real wages?

THE test will come then. The Treasury officials give their answer unequivocally. If wages rise by more than scheduled in the National Budget, unemployment will rise by more than scheduled in the National Budget too. What the workers gain on the swings they will lose on the roundabouts.

In order to make that threat stick, Cohen-Orgad will have to keep a tight rein on the money-supply. He must make no allowance to ministries for their increased wage bills; refuse to help industries and firms in financial trouble; deny development funds to hospitals even if they threaten closure.

The real question is not whether the minister is capable of applying such harsh policies, but whether he can persuade the Histadrut that he has that intention and that capacity.

His job is to present organized labour with the country's dilemma: either wage restraint and mild unemployment, in all likelihood temporary; or else bankruptcies, with the unemployment rising this year not to 90,000 but to 120,000 and more. The coming wage negotiations are going to be very fateful for many people.

TEL AVIV STOCK MARKET REVIEW

Some analysts predict market rally

By JOSEPH MORGENTHAU
Jerusalem Post Finance Reporter

In the days of former Finance Minister Yoram Aridor, stock market followers became used to pronouncements from the Treasury as to the validity or lack of validity of investments in shares. Until about a week ago Finance Minister Yigal Cohen-Orgad had suddenly avoided making any such comments. When he broke his self-imposed silence he did so with a banger. The finance minister's statement questioning the efficacy of investing in shares which had already risen sharply made the headlines in one of the dailies. The statement was enough to awaken the bears from their hibernation. They came into the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange and made shambles of share prices.

Allegations that the Danot Investment company was suffering from liquidity problems heightened the selling pressures in a vicious downward moving market. On Wednesday the selling fever reached a peak with 353 securities falling by margins of 5-40 per cent. Yehalom Hotels and Ararat Insurance saw their shares fall by more than 40 per cent. On the same day no fewer than 47 issues were marked as "sellers only" for the second consecutive session and the following day many of those shares could have fallen by tens of percentage points. As it was, on Thursday there was a reversal of the trend as market insiders were able to engineer a rally which left most prices on the upside.

Many other issues did not suffer such heavy one-day losses but daily 10 per cent losses such as absorbed by Aryeh Insurance for four consecutive days had the same telling effect.

By the week's end the General Share Index had fallen by 17.8%, commercial bank shares excepted.

In spite of the heavy losses, more than a few share market analysts were predicting that the market would shortly rebound. Some went as far as to suggest that a sustained market rally would develop.

Underlying these predictions are expectations of massive bond and savings schemes redemptions. "It is inconceivable that a portion of these funds will not wind up in the share market. Even if only a small fraction is directed into the effect of pushing up prices to considerably higher levels," predicted an analyst.

The underlying thread of optimism was reinforced by last Thursday's rally which came after four sessions of heavy losses.

Nevertheless, the fundamentals have not changed as indicated by the 12 per cent rise in the cost-of-living index for February. Moreover, the balance of payments deficit which had improved in January once again worsened in February. There is a continued high level of monetary injection in the economy by the government. While this is negative for the economy as a whole it certainly does not mean bad news for the stock exchange which generally thrives when money is not tight.

WALL STREET WEEK

Expected smaller deficit boosts U.S. stocks

NEW YORK (AP). — After a long, cold winter on Wall Street, hopes are mounting that the Bull market for stocks is heating up again.

This feeling has been spurred by some signs that the U.S. government budget deficit, which has been bedeviling the markets for months, might not turn out to be quite as disastrous and intractable a problem as it has been lately portrayed.

When President Ronald Reagan announced agreement with congressional Republicans late in the past week on a plan to shrink projected deficits by $74 billion over the next three years, there was a euphoric response in the stock market. But even before that, some market analysts had begun to suggest that gloom over the deficits and the outlook for stocks was reaching excessive depths.

"Every problem has a way of generating the seeds of its own solution," said Raymond Devos, an analyst at the firm of Legg, Mason, Wood, Walker Inc.

In the case of the deficit, he said, the markets themselves, with their recent declines, have played a role in pushing the problem toward a possible resolution "by scaring the politicians as well as the administration."

"We do not expect the problem magically to disappear, but feel that the eventual deficits will be much lower than the boxcar figures now in circulation."

"These lower-than-consensus figures, in our opinion, will be a function of: one, some tax increases; two, cuts in the defence budget; three, only modest cuts in social welfare spending programmes and four, higher than expected receipts as the economy continues to expand."

Many economists have noted that recent monthly deficit figures have been coming in below projections. One apparent reason for this is that a stronger-than-expected U.S. economy is bolstering government revenues.

The idea that the general level of pessimism had gone to extremes also struck John Mendelson, a technical analyst at Dean Witter Reynolds Inc. "We believe the second leg of this Bull market is beginning in this immediate area," he told the firm's clients last Monday.

"We look for an advance to well above the 1983 highs in all major stock market averages during the remainder of this year," he added.

With such upbeat appraisals going for it, the market had its best week of the new year, with the Dow Jones Average of 30 industrials recording five consecutive gains and finishing with a flourish — a 16.96-point gain on Friday. For the week, the average recorded a net of 44.60 to 1,184.36.

The last time it posted a better weekly showing was June 13-17 of last year, when it rose 46.08.

The New York Stock Exchange

composite index chimed in with a 2.79 gain to 91.73, and the American Stock Exchange market value index was up 5.28 to 212.42. Big board volume averaged 92.38 million shares a day, against 79.47 million the week before.

With all the improvement in stock traders' mood, there were still many sceptics on Wall Street.

"If the deficit is $150 billion this year instead of $184b, should we turn bullish on bonds and stocks?" said Edward Yardeni, economist at Prudential-Bache Securities.

"We don't think so as long as the credit demands of home buyers, consumers and businesses continue to grow as rapidly as they have in recent months. Maybe if the deficit were zero we'd be more optimistic, but it isn't."

"Undoubtedly, a lower-than-expected budget deficit will push bond and stock prices up, temporarily. But after the initial burst of euphoria, investors will realize that policies which stimulate economic booms also boost credit demands and risk stimulating inflation."

World's greatest life insurance salesman

By AARON SITTNER
Jerusalem Post Reporter

One of the world's biggest bargains is still the hardest product to sell. So says Ben Feldman of Liverpool, Ohio, believed by many of his peers to be the world's greatest life insurance salesman.

Feldman, interviewed this week at the Jerusalem Hilton Hotel, where he was a guest of the Israel Association of Insurance Brokers and Agents at their convention, pulled an $100 bill out of his pocket and asked: "Would you give me a shekel for this note?"

"Certainly," came the reply. "Well, that's exactly what you get when you buy life insurance...you get a hundred worry-free tomorrows for every single day you contribute towards your future."

Feldman, subject of three books on life insurance salesmanship and with more than $800 million worth of sold policies under his belt, added: "I've been at this game for 40 years, and believe me, selling life insurance is just as hard now as it was when I began. Why? Well, nobody but nobody plans on dying today."

though in the back of their minds people admit that they may die tomorrow, or next month or next year. Their reply, when you raise the question of life insurance, is not to bother them today. There is no money for that now. Come back some other time."

Feldman, whose own life is insured for several million dollars, spends a good part of his selling efforts on "key man" life insurance coverage for business executives as well as drawing up corporate life insurance plans. "There's no substitute for research," he explains.

"Before I see a potential client I make a thorough study of his financial position: credit rating, earnings, family size — the whole picture. You'd be surprised how much you can learn about a man without his telling you all about himself. "Then, when I arrive with my policy proposal, I can make clear to him how much easier his family and he will have it — if he dies — that is, if he buys enough insurance to cover all his debts and family obligations, such as maintaining his family on the level to which it has become accustomed, and ensuring the education of his children. "Many American banks now refuse to renew credit lines even to their best customers unless they can prove they have sufficient life insurance."

Feldman, a chartered life underwriter, is a special agent of the 139-year-old New York Life Insurance Company. He is also a life member of the Million Dollar Round Table, the life insurance industry's most prestigious trade organization.

Run away inflation

THERE WAS no surprise in the 12 per cent inflation recorded for February. Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir himself said so on Thursday. It should, however, have caused more concern and less self-satisfaction with current policies than have so far been evinced by Finance Minister Yigal Cohen-Orgad and the government as a whole.

February was the fifth consecutive month in which inflation ran at the two-digit level. Since September, prices have doubled. It is already a virtual certainty that a similar rate of inflation will be recorded for March, and for April, the month of Pessah, observers predict inflation as high as 20 per cent. Having reached such dizzy heights for what by May will have been eight consecutive months, no sudden descent can be expected later in the year. Official economists keep their fingers crossed, hoping that inflation will at least remain stable at this rate, and not accelerate.

From recent statements by Mr. Cohen-Orgad, and particularly from his call last week for a "social understanding" — which previously went under the less lofty term of "package deal" — it is clear that the finance minister himself has come to the conclusion that the effects of his policies have overshot the mark he had expected or intended.

It does not yet seem to have dawned on him that the continuation of inflation at the present level signifies the failure of his policy. That policy was, and still is, designed to send the economy into a recession — albeit a "controlled" one — so as to improve the balance of payments by curtailing imports and diverting output to exports.

The economy, however, refuses to go into recession. Mr. Cohen-Orgad's price boosts since last October have been so sharp and sudden that they seem to have caused a significant part of the public to dip into their accumulated savings in order to maintain their consumption levels. The fact that savings schemes and government obligations in vast amounts are reaching maturity now, and are being redeemed at the high nominal values to which inflation has boosted them, further accentuates this trend, because it creates the illusion of a windfall.

Taken together with the monetary deluge provided by continued money printing, the recession that should have throttled back imports and boosted exports is no longer in sight. The surest indication that a massive demand inflation, piled on top of the cost inflation generated by the finance minister, is playing havoc with his policy, is to be found in the index of wholesale industrial prices. Since September, that index has risen by 109 per cent, compared with the 100 per cent of the consumer price index. If industrialists have been able to raise their wholesale prices even faster than retail prices have gone up, although their real wage costs have gone down considerably, it is a sure sign that demand has risen.

The chief losers in this game are the overwhelming majority of wage earners who have no accumulated savings to fall back upon, or will soon have exhausted the reserves they had. By the beginning of May, when they will be paid the next cost-of-living allowance with their April salaries — estimated at some 40 per cent — the compensation will already have been wiped out by the inflation of February, March and April.

When Mr. Cohen-Orgad talks of keeping the standard of living at the 1981-82 level, which does not sound so bad, considering that we were not starving then, he purveys two sets of half-truths. First, he speaks of the standard of living, but he means wages, and wages only, for he has no control over the standard of living of those who do not make their living out of wages, or whose wages come from the black economy. Secondly, inflation always leaves the wage earner behind, and the higher its rate, the greater is his loss.

The "social understanding" that Mr. Cohen-Orgad now wants means wage earners willingly and "understandingly" accepting what he has so far imposed on them. Otherwise, he threatens, he will have to apply even more of the medicine he has laded out so far.

His own inability, so far, to curtail the government's deficit and money printing, and the stubborn refusal of the economy to go into recession, make the finance minister's threats even less credible than his pretence to keep inflation, recession, public spending and everything else under control.

Instead of his "social understanding," the finance minister must therefore expect the wage earners to insist on a monthly cost-of-living allowance, and additional compensatory payments. While this will not make wage earners win the inflationary race, it will no doubt speed it up.

A government that still has a sense of public responsibility and of self-respect would have conceded defeat long ago and gone to the polls. The one we have seems to be intent on leaving scorched earth behind.

EARLY ELECTIONS

for six months and thus upset Tami's own plans.

The same tactic, it is contended, could work with other possible waverers in the House such as Yigael Hurvitz and Mordechai Ben-Porat, who have indicated that they might support early elections.

Another version of events widely accepted in Labour says that Labour is waging a war of nerves against Tami and the waverers, and that at the last moment it would step back from the brink because it would not want to risk the six-month delay. If by Thursday Tami and the other MKs do not come round, Labour will not put its bill to a vote.

Finally, the view is growing in Labour that the Likud is not as afraid of early elections as it has been. The party's performance in the opinion polls is improving somewhat, the government hopes soon to move the Israel Defence Forces out of most of Lebanon and it can probably prevent the economy from sliding too drastically for yet another few months, according to this view. Thus, these Labour people say, the best time for elections from the Likud's point of view would be November 1984. By then, the Lebanon pullback would be a fact, and the economic belt a bit less tight. This is the reason Labour should back elections in July, which is sooner than is convenient for the Likud.

The Knesset does not usually meet on Thursdays, but this week is an exception: there will be no session tomorrow, Shushan Purim.

SHOULD Histadrut leaders themselves decide on the labour federation's policies or should they pay heed to Labour Party guidelines, since the party commands an absolute majority in the federation?

Senior party members, representing kibbutzim, moshavim and urban party branches, maintain the labour scene is far too important to be left solely in the hands of Histadrutniks. But the labour federation's leaders unanimously argue that if the party messes in their affairs, it will mess things up.

The controversy has heated up since Ya'acov Levinson's suicide on February 23. In a suicide note, the former Bank Hapoalim chief described himself as the victim of a power struggle in the bank and the Histadrut leadership.

Levinson's charges have not helped Histadrut secretary-general Yehoram Meshel, who wants to become the bank's chairman once he steps down from his present job. Some Labour Party members are grumbling that they feel out of the picture.

Their demand for a greater input is not a new phenomenon. Certainly the party had had a greater say on Histadrut policies before the 1977 national elections, when the Likud unseated the Labour-led government.

This reporter recalls waiting, during Labour's heyday, in the corridor of party headquarters on Rehov Hayarkon in Tel Aviv while Meshel, then finance minister Yehoshua Rabinowitz and other senior government, Histadrut and party officials debated specific issues. Eventually they emerged and announced their decisions, which were brought to the Histadrut Executive for rubber stamping.

In an interview in the Knesset several days ago, MK Aharon

A question of control

By JOSHUA BRILLIANT

Harel, a former head of the Histadrut Organization Department, maintained that the labour federation took advantage of Labour being in opposition to demand "there should be no (party) intervention in the Histadrut." The party has never been left out of the picture as it is now, he continued.

THIS IS not surprising. Meshel has succeeded in presenting the party with a solid front. His Central Committee comprises members of all major Labour Party factions, and all settle their differences among themselves. It is a tribute to his manipulative skills that there is no running to the party at large for support or to its headquarters for a "binding" ruling.

Meshel controls the labour federation. When Central Committee member Gideon Ben-Yisrael seemed to develop too much independence, he found himself spending several years in a fairly obscure party office. Even Israel Kessar, the No. 2 man in the Histadrut, continuously shows deference to Meshel.

The Histadrut became more independent because it is the only Labour executive arm confronting the Likud-led government. Therefore, it does not have to coordinate policies with other executive organizations.

But some senior Labour Party members maintain that the Histadrut has become too independent. Besides Harel, this group includes MKs Uzi Baram, Haim Ramon and Avraham Katz-Oz, and an aide to party chairman Shimon Peres told The Jerusalem Post that they reflect a more widespread feeling. Here one finds the push for Meshel's abdication.

Meshel's departure is a matter of time, but it will not settle the question of Histadrut independence since Kessar, the heir-apparent, shares Meshel's views on this issue. The Labour critics of the Histadrut rejected this reporter's suggestion that since the rank and file voted the organization's leaders in by a clear majority, the latter deserve a good measure of independence.

This is immaterial, say the critics. "Show me a worker who remembers who was the third person on the Labour-Alignment list," Harel said. "Workers voted Alignment, not for Meshel — nor for anyone else."

According to one critic, Histadrut members voted Alignment despite Meshel.

The Labour Party, say the critics, should set guidelines for the labour federation and be involved in major appointments, while day-to-day management of Histadrut affairs should be left to the trade unionists.

MK Ramon complained that major Histadrut moves had not been brought to the party for clearance. The decision to coopt Shimi into the ruling Labour-Mapam-Independent Liberal coalition was taken without proper consultations, he charged.

The Histadrut nearly prevented a party debate on the doctors' strike,

"because it feared its position would not be supported. Only when the matter came to a head was there a debate," Ramon said heatedly.

CLEARLY party leaders were unhappy with the system of appointments in the Histadrut. The party chose the Histadrut Central Committee members and approved the candidates for labour council secretaries, but Hevrat Ha'ovdim, which controls a quarter of the country's economy, was too independent to their taste.

Ben Rabinowitz, executive director of the holding company, says that Histadrut enterprises have been fairly free of party intervention. Managers of Histadrut-owned enterprises have to adhere to labour movement ideology but need not be card-carrying members of any party. Moreover, the Labour Party's formal role is limited to nominating Hevrat Ha'ovdim's chairman and secretary only.

A well-placed source said that in preparing the list of party representatives for Hevrat Ha'ovdim's managing committee, party leaders outside the Histadrut establishment were consulted, but the formal decisions and nominations were made inside the Labour faction in the Histadrut — and that was where party intervention stopped.

HISTADRUT leaders agree that the party should set some general guidelines, but stressed that too much intervention would be harmful.

"The Histadrut must not be seen as serving party interests," commented Central Committee member Shaul Ben-Simhon.

Some 90 per cent of Israel's workers belong to the Histadrut and the labour federation's leadership must appear to have their interests at heart — not the party's, some argued. As it is, the Likud faction in the Histadrut constantly accuses the labour federation's leadership of being motivated by party considerations when opposing government measures.

"The Histadrut will lose its members' trust if it is perceived as a party tool in day-to-day matters," says Gideon Ben-Yisrael, now Harel's successor in the labour federation's Organization Department.

According to Ben-Yisrael the Histadrut ought to "listen" to the party before deciding in principle on a major issue such as whether to conclude a package deal with the government and the private employers. But the conditions for such a deal should be set in the Histadrut only, he insisted.

Ben-Yisrael also opposed party members' demands for a greater say in appointments. "Bank Hapoalim, Koor and Soliel Boneh are Histadrut institutions and appointments to their managements are Histadrut matters," he insisted.

"Would a party appointments committee consider the professional merits of each candidate?" Ben Yisrael asked.

Meanwhile, Party Chairman Shimon Peres defused the situation by announcing he would present the party's bureau with "a proposal" on this matter.

Peres made the statement last week and an aide said it was a compromise.

The writer is a member of The Jerusalem Post editorial staff.

FINANCE MINISTER Cohen-Orgad's policy, in a nutshell, seems to be:

a) The people are consuming too much;

b) We'll put up the prices so they'll consume less;

c) Due to all sorts of linkages incomes will climb again, but there will be a time-lag. During this time-lag incomes trail behind and consumption is reduced;

d) This process will be repeated indefinitely so that, overall, there will be a substantial reduction in consumption.

That this process will entail unheard-of inflation has not escaped Cohen-Orgad, but it doesn't seem to worry him unduly. After all, what does it matter whether a family's income and expenditure stand at ten thousand or one hundred thousand shekels? These are just figures which, in themselves, have no significance.

While the argument is superficially attractive a little probing below the surface will reveal its flaws. Human activities are not just economic functions. There are moral, ethical and psychological aspects to our doings.

One of the foremost rules in an orderly society is that loans and debts must be paid on time. Every parent inculcating a modicum of moral responsibility into his offspring will stress the importance of meeting his obligations when due.

What does inflation do? It teaches him that the longer you default the better. Let the other fellow's money depreciate in value — not your own! A government encouraging inflation is, therefore, encouraging unethical behaviour.

The dividing line between unethical behaviour and crime is thin. The increasing crime rate is one of our major worries. By encouraging inflation, the government is also encouraging crime.

WHEN INFLATION was still below the three-figure level, political

INFLATIONARY FOLLY

By ERIC GUTWILLIG

commentators were at pains to warn of grave social consequences. On what did they base this gloomy forecast?

They prophesied that democracy would be in danger. People value democracy very highly but the question is whether they value it above everything else.

If they feel that their democratically elected leaders are incapable of introducing an orderly society, perhaps they will do without their democratically elected leaders. For no one can claim that a society enduring a rate of inflation of hundreds of per cent can be called orderly. It is probably no coincidence that those South American states suffering from three-figure inflation are those associated with military dictatorships.

Those who are in private business are constantly faced with the choice of raising prices and thereby annoying their customers, or absorbing rising costs and endangering their businesses.

Nobody likes to irritate his customers and the constant need for unpleasant arguments has a demoralising effect on many business men. It also engenders resentment and little bits of resentment spread across the whole nation over a prolonged period of time amount to quite a lot of national resentment and eventual demoralisation.

WHATEVER the merits or demerits of dollarization, in practice it is carried out more and more. This hardly induces respect for the country's currency, and since the currency is symbolic of the country itself it hardly engenders pride in one's country.

Planning for the future becomes a nightmare; more than that — an impossibility. Who can plan a year ahead when he has no idea what his shekels will be worth then?

Thrift is discouraged. Why not grab an article today, whether you need it or not, when tomorrow it may cost who knows what? Moderate workers' leaders are silenced. How can they resist the demands of their followers when the purchasing power of their wages is constantly eroded and only monopolists can raise their prices ad lib?

The point is that inflation can be controlled, but not as long as the present system of linkage is maintained. The workers are as weary as everyone else of the crazy merry-go-round of rising prices and rising wages. A moderate, well-reasoned approach by the government for an accord with organized labour would not fall on deaf ears.

A lot is heard about the need to fight emigration, but to that end we must make our country a pleasant place to live in. For the government to encourage a rate of inflation of hundreds of per cent is hardly the way to do so.

READERS' LETTERS

THE BEN-YEHUDA MALL

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post Sir, — I'd like to reply to the article published under the title "Sign removal, miff Jerusalem merchants," which appeared on March 11.

The Ben-Yehuda Pedestrian Mall is an asset for all Jerusalem residents.

The reshaping of Ben-Yehuda Street, which included the restoration of the beautiful facades and required many resources and delicate work, created a spot of beauty. Jerusalem residents and guests from abroad are delighted.

The Mall is part of a development project of the city's centre that includes the Pritzker Square, Rosental Square and the Frances L. Hiatt Garden, which will be dedicated on April 3. It demanded not only complex work but also the reshaping of shops, which are the main beneficiaries of the Ben-Yehuda Mall.

The Jerusalem Municipality did not content itself with the plan for reshaping the shops' facades, which was done with the cooperation of the Council for a Beautiful Israel. It established funds to provide the merchants with loans to make new appropriate signs for their businesses.

We are sorry that this important project did not receive the cooperation of all merchants but encountered the illogical behaviour of several of them who, instead of looking at the benefit to the city and its citizens, are being as conservative and old-fashioned as the street was before its restoration.

The Jerusalem Municipality will continue its work and will support all those who help in turning the city's centre into an attractive place, even though there are people who still live with the concept of a forsaken town.

The Municipality is of course acting in this matter in accordance with the law and its authority.

THE JORDANIAN OPTION

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post Sir, — Unless Mr. Shimon Peres has it on good authority that King Hussein is today ready to accept what he repeatedly refused to do when the Labour government was in power regarding Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district — then I do not understand what he is talking about.

Mr. Peres continues to repeat his ancient proposals, underlining what his party is willing and unwilling to return to Jordan. It is his famous "Jordanian Option" which King Hussein always rejected, insisting that every square metre of the territory occupied during the Six Day War, including Jerusalem, must be returned to Jordan, although it was lost in a war of aggression. Jordan would not have lost it had the King listened to Mr. Levi Eshkol's appeal to him not to attack Israel. (King Hussein is probably aware what the Russians did in such a case after World War Two!)

There is no doubt that, had the Labour government succeeded in signing a peace treaty with Jordan on the basis of Mr. Peres' suggestions, a Likud government might not have come to power or would have recognized an established fact, i.e. an international treaty.

MOSHE BEN ELIYAHU

OVERDOING RELIGION

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post Sir, — Last Friday night a boy was born and therefore the Brit Mila was held on the following Saturday morning.

It was held in a hotel in Bat Yam and there must have been 350 people there. As the rabbi prepared to begin, the brother of one of the child's grandmothers took a flash picture of the ceremony. The rabbi became livid — the Sabbath was being desecrated. This was explained to the photographer who apparently had not thought that this Brit was different from any other, and he stopped. The rabbi would not continue until the camera was put on the table in front of him. The photographer complied.

However, this was not enough for the rabbi. As he was leaving the hall, he passed the table where the photographer and his two sisters and families were seated (one the baby's grandparents), and when he came to this man, he said to him: "For desecrating the Sabbath, you will not live to see the end of the year!"

The grandfather and his brother told the rabbi that if he did not get right back up on that stage and apologize, he would not live to leave the room; the grandmother fainted; the man's wife and sister were crying even an hour after he had apologized.

Such actions make some of us immigrants wonder about this Jewish land we came to. If that is the meaning of religion, please spare me from it.

IMMIGRANT HOUSING

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post Sir, — I refer to your report of March 6 on Knesset activities concerning my statement to the Knesset Aliya Committee.

I made my statement in reaction to that of the representative of the Ministry of Housing, who said that, in accordance with its policy, the Ministry of Housing would no longer provide public rental flats to immigrants.

I praised the considerable help given to immigrants by the Ministry of Housing in the form of mortgages and the plan to increase the amounts granted as rental subsidies.

At the same time, I claimed, and still claim, that a policy which denies immigrants the option of public rental flats disregards the facts of immigration and absorption. A large number of immigrants who remain for more than a year in absorption centres and in subsidized private rental flats simply do not have the means to take advantage of the help offered by the Ministry of Housing because they do not have the money to pay their share in the purchase of a flat.

A large percentage of potential immigrants, both from developed countries and from countries of distress, do not have the possibility of buying a flat on the private market before their arrival in Israel or immediately afterwards, and therefore the increased mortgage does not constitute a solution of this problem for them.

Our opinion on the matter was presented in a friendly atmosphere at the meeting of the Chairman and Treasurer of the Jewish Agency with the Ministers of Housing and Absorption. It was also the subject of a study by the chairman-elect of the department, J. Aharon, and the two ministers, and will be investigated further when Mr. Aharon takes office upon his return to Israel.

DENTAL COSTS

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post Sir, — In reply to Baruch Saville's "Not so golden years" (March 1), I take exception to the exaggerated figures given as the cost of a set of dentures, which varies from $600 to $2000 and not more, and especially to the remark, "usually with no receipts."

My sympathies are with the pensioners who have difficulty coping even with these fees, but the TV and press seem to have a vendetta against dentists, which is both offensive and unjust. Perhaps the Israeli public should look to prevention instead of cure and early treatment rather than late. A single cavity, if neglected, can result in relatively expensive root fillings, crowns and bridges, which could be avoided.

New Prime Minister Shimon Peres — can he unite the nation?

Unity government to buy the people, bore the people

By RUBEN ARENSTEIN
Juicy Lemon Post Knesset Reporter

We are determined to go ahead determinedly with the creation of several frozen settlements in West Samaria and the Judea Bank, declared Prime Minister Shimon Peres in presenting his national unity government in the Knesset on Friday.

The wall-to-wall carpeted coalition will also, Shimon Peres cooed, aim at a peace treaty with Hussein by offering considerable territory west of the blue line (Ashkelon-Nahariya).

The IDF withdrawal from Lebanon will be completed within a few days, he promised, although he did not specify when the few days would commence.

On the economic front, Shimon Peres proclaimed a "multi-pronged, four-square, triple-decked, two-faced war on woes." One week, he explained, the Treasury "will tackle the balance of payments problem. The next week advances will be made in lowering inflation. The third week unemployment will be eased. The fourth week we'll take a look at what's been happening to the balance of payments during the preceding fortnight."

The fifth week, if we are still in office, we will have another bash at inflation and so on, etc., undeniably. The vicious circle, he explained, will have become a "hoof of prosperity, a ring of roses, a hug of a hug."

He reported his delight at the ease with which the coalition negotiations had been completed and he lauded the patriotism and selflessness of all parties concerned. "There were absolutely no payoffs," he insisted,

TEL AVIV. — A tripartite package deal was tied up here last night after lengthy, marathon all-day negotiations between the three main factors in the economy — the Histadrut, representing labour council secretaries; the Treasury, representing the Government Printer, and the coordinating committee of economic organizations representing some nebulous, amorphous group whom this reporter has as yet been unable to identify.

The wrapped-up package should ensure complete industrial peace for at least the next five days. It represents a victory for our side, and of glory over the vicious underground, unpatriotic, machinations of all three opponents, spokesmen for all our opinions, told the Juicy Lemon Post.

The triple deal provides three things:

1. Celery will not be raised this year.
2. No more taxes will be imported.
3. There will be an absolute prize freeze.

The first point was achieved reasonably easily and with little difficulty after Pessah Grupper pointed out, betraying a hitherto unknown knowledge of Biblical literature, that the winter is passed and the voice of the Texas dove is heard in the land.

The taxi decision came after protracted international contacts, involving several visits to the Middle East by the West German chancellor

Pity, pity, tut tut, say boggle-minded officials

Officials in Jerusalem last night were not surprised by the swift-moving changes in the area. "Non-plussed," was how one senior official described the mood.

However, a slightly more senior official declined to use the word "staggering," preferring to reserve it to refer to his minister's normal method of entry into the office.

An even more senior official was about to use a franker term, but his wife wouldn't let him.

The general feeling among ministry lower echelons is that Israel now has a number of options. When pressed, one said "Ouch!"

Israel will press on with its policy come what may, a source very close to a minister whispered.

Circles round the minister's driver admitted the situation was not all that could be expected but warned that one day it might well be. Unless, of course, he added with a touch of grimace, "something were done."

The minister himself was not available for comment but a spokesman, asked for the possibilities, emphatically stated: "Osher osher." Asked to elucidate, he collapsed in a fit of giggles.

The general feeling was of dismay, rather than gloom, although one source insisted he was gloomy but not at all dismayed. "Dismay or June should see a turn for the better; after WASHINGTON. — Special Middle East envoy Donald Bumstead admitted yesterday that he had danced with Yasser Arafat at a Munich beer garden last week, but emphatically denied there had been any close contact with the PLO leadership.

"We mainly did the polka," Bumstead told the House Committee on Foreign Relations and Unmanned Behaviour. "There was none of that cheek-to-cheek stuff, as the press has alleged. You just don't dance cheek-to-cheek with Yasser Arafat."

Committee chairman J. Calhoun Hogjowls (D-Alabama) demanded to know why Bumstead had danced with the terrorist chieftain, who is known to be notoriously inept on the dancefloor.

"It was a mistake," Bumstead stoutly maintained. "I'd had a few steins and I was cutting the carpet with that cute West German NATO general. Then the bandleader yelled out to change partners, and I found myself holding the hand of this tubby fellow wearing dark glasses and a towel on his head. He does a pretty good foxtrot, by the way."

"I think I can safely say that no matters of substance were discussed," Bumstead said. "I remember he asked me what I was doing after the show, and I said I was making a surprise visit to a Middle Eastern country. I did not reveal which country, because I was on a standby ticket and did not know which country I was supposed to visit anyway. It's always a surprise. I only know that if they serve you that sweet ground-up carp as a first course, it's Israel."

Jewish Agency finds something to do

By JODIE SQUIGGLE

The Jewish Agency and the World Zionist Organization last night decided to disband, by a unanimous vote of the board of governors.

The two bodies are to be reorganized into a travel and entertainment conglomerate, to be known as the Zionist World Agency (ZWA).

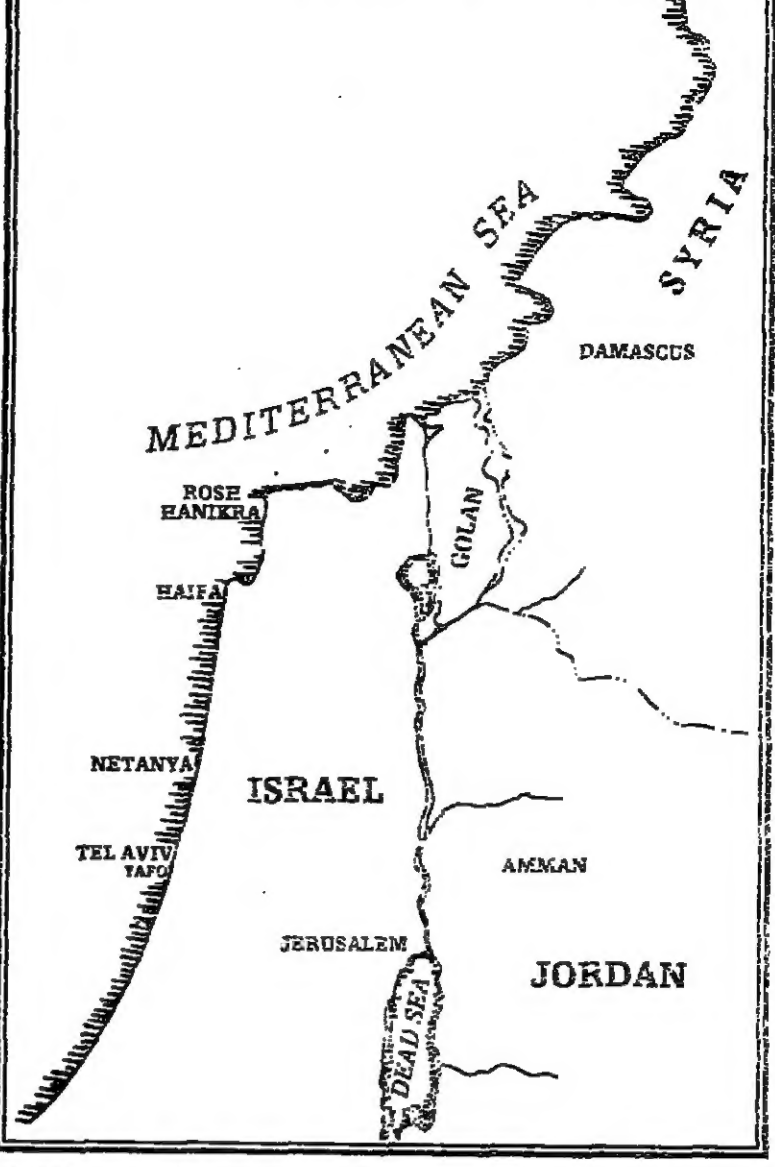

The ZWA, which will be headed by the former chairman of its defunct predecessors, Arye Dulzin, is to be run on a strictly profit-making basis.

The key money-making component of the new conglomerate is to be a large amusement park complex situated in the former Jewish Agency/WZO headquarters on Jerusalem's King George Street. "It will be kind of a combination of Disneyland and Beth Hatefutsoth," Dulzin explained.

The park, to be known tentatively as Herzland, will feature rides and other amusements based on well-known Zionist themes. But while similar ventures make use of lifelike, mechanized mannequins that speak and move among the exhibits, Herzland will feature real-life Zionist personalities. These will provide the often-lacking human touch, for as long as they remain available.

Rimon-Robinberg examines the background to the economic crisis.

NOW ONLY YIGAL "Cut-throat" Cohen-Orgad is inside, doing time. The others are out, going straight, they say. "Red" Simha is dead, a victim of the vicious infighting that has wracked the Free Market gang since it established its domination over the turf in 1977. They all had their brief day of glory, but the attrition rate was fierce. Now "Cut-throat," a member of the younger generation, is alone.

Once they were all equals, petty monetary gangsters united against the big boys, the Socialist gang. They controlled a few streets in south Tel Aviv, running a small protection racket, dealing a little jingoistic dope. Small stuff. But they had time on their hands and they were hungry. Years on the street had made them canny and mean.

The Socialists had run the joint too long. They had grown flabby, careless, greedy. Their protection network was over-extended; they could no longer deliver the goods. The young bucks on the street wanted a change.

When the takeover finally came in 1977 it was brutal. By the time the Socialist gang finally awoke from their power-induced stupor to what was happening, it was too late. Some of their top boys, neighbourhood strongmen, saw the writing on the wall and slipped out quietly in the night to join Yigal "Prof" Yudin's gang. Second-raters, snitches, they joined forces with the Free Market gang when the blood-letting was over.

When the smoke cleared it was obvious that the Socialist boys had been wiped off the streets. The Free Market gang had arrived.

With "Red" Simha, whose mild exterior belied his killer instinct, at their head, they changed the rules of the game on the streets. According to Monetarist Squad chief Rav-Pakud Milton Friedman, they opened up rackets that had formerly been tightly controlled by the Socialist gang. Foreign currency deals, political prostitution, big-time numbers games — it was the hey-day of the underworld.

But it was vicious out on the streets: big money was changing hands and younger thugs were trying to muscle in on the action. The stakes were flying high. "Red" Simha, the gentleman gangster, didn't have what it takes to control the rapidly inflated network.

The Razor Claque, headed by Yigal "Budget-Cutter" Hurwitz, engineered his downfall. "Red" Simha went into enforced retirement, pining for the occasional foreign loan just to keep his hand in. He died mysteriously last year in a hall of invective from the Fat Man, who accused him of having contacts with a representative of the American Mob. The case was never solved.

Hurwitz did not last long at the top. Despite his renown with the razor and the tight belt. The Free Market gang had grown used to the good life. They drove fancy limousines and snorted the purest Colombian imports. They resented Hurwitz's attempts to change their lifestyle and impose discipline on the street.

Hurwitz had been an outsider: only his fearsome reputation and his family connections had landed him on the "throne." When the time came to do him in, it came from the inside. The contract was taken up by Yoram "Dollar" Aridor, a second generation member of the Infighting Family and reputedly an intimate of M. (for Mugsy) Begin, the Godfather, the Capo del Capo.

Aridor lasted three years in the hot seat, and for a while the going was good. He brutally eradicated all traces of Hurwitz's rampage and, in true Sicilian fashion, introduced the dolce vita to the streets. Armed robbery of the future to pay for the present flourished. Lower ranking members of the gang fenced huge amounts of hot automobiles, refrigerators and videos. Cold-heartedly, Aridor overvalued the ROSH HANUKKA. — An easy hush settled over the northern border yesterday and onagers grazed peacefully right up to the front line. Two convicts who had escaped last Wednesday week from the Beersheba lockup turned back angrily at the checkpoint here and gave your reporter the startling news: Lehenoff has gone!

Hastily donning her bicycle clips, your reporter rushed to the scene and was able to confirm the convicts' unlikely story. Indeed, there was no Lehenoff.

Twiddling her transistor, your reporter heard Radio Monte Carlo repeat the dramatic announcement: "President Jimmy Yel has decreed the dissolution of Lehenoff."

The radio's Middle East correspondent somewhere off the Levant coast gave the following details:

At a stormy session of the Lehenoff national reconciliation, consolidation and no-crying-over-spilled-milk committee, the president reported on his efforts to keep the country together.

He revealed that Bank Hapoalim had been secretly negotiating a take-over of Lehenoff, as had been reported in the Tel Aviv drug addicts' gazette, Had a shot, but Giora Gazon had vetoed the plan, saying, "Who do you think I am, pal?"

There were boos from the Boozie. Jimmy Yel phoned and rose trembling to his feet. "I'm fed up," yelled Yel.

"Good," cried Wally Jumpalot, the Boozie fighters' leader. "We'll take over."

Up popped Nebech Berry to lead his delegation in the raucous chanting of "For Shi'a a jolly good fellow... and so slay all of us."

No Sunni said than done.

When order had been restored and the empty chairs removed, Jimmy Yel noted sagely, "You should have stayed off your ego trip, O liberator." And he added in his impeccable English: "You should have known which Sidon your bread is buttered. If not, try to Atey your fears. Let's all git while the going's good."

Whereupon the Sheenie and the Flinch and the Kuni and the He'ite delegations all rushed for the boats, pausing on the way solely to pick up a few tanker-loads to settle each other's hash.

The last one out pulled the plug.

Rumours of medium-range-reaching changes in the situation in Lehenoff had not been confirmed last week by cautious observers known for their closeness to the accepted observation point from which they can throw a detached glance once in a while at what is supposed to be going on well, not quite under their noses, but, as was predicted in these columns a number of weeks ago, not too far from their Middle East weeklies.

Come what may, had Israel played its cards properly, indeed, had it any cards, indeed, had it been invited to the game in the first place and indeed had there ever been a game, things might have turned out differently, if indeed they had turned out at all.

Spinning our wheels

THE PROPOSAL is not without merit, and it ill behooves us to dismiss it out of hand just because it originated with the Likud government, which is usually sufficient grounds for doing so. As is well-known, this newspaper has, on occasions too numerous to mention or to remember, taken a vigorous and courageous stand against the rising tide of traffic accidents, which has prompted many reckless drivers to cancel their subscriptions.

Thus we would all be well-advised to ponder the implications of this proposal, but without straining ourselves too much and without the pessimism produced by petty preconceptions of partisan prejudice.

True, the technical changes required by the proposal to reduce the appalling rate of traffic accidents would commit the unpardonable sin of increasing the already unspeakable burden on our budget deficit of unmentionable proportions, thus further incapacitating our productive capacity and propelling the propensity to save down the tubes.

And yet, what are a few extra zeros in the budget deficit compared with a few less zeros in the budget deficit? What indeed? (If anyone knows the answer to this question, please send it Posthaste to our Letters to the Editor column.)

Therefore it is high time to re-examine our national priorities and our overseas shnorrities, to take stock of our economic shock, and to question further subsidies for basic commodities and incidental oddities.

The proposal could profoundly affect our relations with the Eastern Bloc, where it could apparently be possibly interpreted as a slight against Communism. Protestations that it is but a slight slight, a minor sock to the Bloc, would be to no avail. The international repercussions would hit us foursquare in the diplomatic pouch, no doubt leading to the cancellation of the forthcoming visit to Israel of the Warsaw chapter of the Dahn Ben-Amotz literary circle that has done so much toward reviving Hebrew culture behind the Iron Curtain.

This is not to gainsay, however, that the move could relieve our current plight with the Western Bloc, if the slight would be seen as precipitating a blight on our relations with the East. But then again, dropping the proposal at this delicate stage, due to diplomatic fright of the blight caused by the slight, would worsen our plight and reinforce our image as a "crazy state," in keeping with the maxim of international relations that "out of sight, out of mind."

Thus, after examining the proposal from all sides, weighing its effects on our foreign and domestic situation, taking account of the internal and external repercussions, analysing the meaning of the proposal for our friends and foes, pondering its implications for the future of Zionism and the Jewish People, we have concluded that it would redound to the benefit of the general welfare if the red lights in traffic signals were to be replaced with blue ones, so that the command to stop at an intersection would be reinforced by the spirit of patriotism, thus reducing the prevailing impulse to charge at the red light when it blinks on.

Israel's Minister of Neurotic Affairs Atan Ormali met with a delegation of visiting manic depressives recently. Speaking at a seminar to discuss the country's chronic overdraft problems, entitled 'Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Cheques But Were Afraid To Ask,' Ormali complained that the economic situation is making Israelis ill. Ormali was at pains to explain how the average Israeli psychotic neurotic could not afford even a basic hypochondria.

"There's only two sure things in life in Israel," bellyached Ormali, "Debt and taxes." Ormali whined that Finance Minister Nimas Lee is picking on paranoids. "All they do is take the money and run. Do they use our taxes to build more pharmacies for the woebegotten public? No, but every street corner has to have a bank. Who needs banks?" he moaned, biting his nails.

MKs find a way of getting a government with balls

By ASHTON GOULDFISH

Juicy Lemon Post Sports Reporter
Israelis went delirious with joy when the Knesset passed the third reading of the Election Law (Amendment) and Purim Basketball Match Act. Exultant citizens danced with joy in the streets; the popping of champagne corks sounded like an Uzi fusillade. One old-timer, weeping emotionally, said: "It reminds me of Independence Day, 1948, except that it is totally different — then our happiness was tempered by anxiety. Now there is no cloud in the sky."

The Act substitutes a basketball match for the general elections that used to provoke utter, utter ennui. The match will be played on Purim. The political party winning it will get the government, while the losers receive Hevrat Ha'odim, Bank Hapoalim and Mifal Hapayis as a consolation prize.

But, while the citizenry danced, drank and made merry, wiser and cooler heads were analysing the details of the Act and calculating the chances of the contestants.

"Too late, the small parties realised at last why the Likud and Labour parties had artfully got together to agree on a last-minute 'slight technical amendment' to the draft Act, by adding the words 'or their spouses' to the clause, 'Teams shall be chosen from members of the Knesset.'"

Enterprising journalists had picked up a leak that Likud was negotiating a "basketball marriage" between Miriam Ta'asa-Glazer and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar of the Los Angeles Lakers, while the Alignment were trying to entice Julius Ervine (Dr. J.) of the Philadelphia 76ers to enter into a basketball romance with Shoshana Arbeli-Almoshino.

Shlomo Lorincz and the Council of Sages at once warned the two Americans that they could never hope to find their final resting-places in any cemetery in Israel.

Shimon Peres justified his dealing with Ervine by saying: "Because of Likud policy, there has been a brain drain of doctors from Israel to the U.S. It is a patriotic act to reverse that intellectual brain drain by getting Dr. J. as an immigrant."

There is some doubt as to whether Abraham Shapiro, the famous playmaker of the coalition, will turn out for the government.

shekel and began a reign of terror among the exporters.

But allegiances are fleeting in the underworld and power lies in the digit of an index. No sooner had Aridor's promises begun to fade, than some of the younger hoods were gripped by visions of grandeur. A bloody war of inheritance erupted with "Dollar" Aridor facing both the young bloods in his own neighbourhood clique and the power-hungry Liberals, who had not forgotten the overthrow of their former strongman "Red" Simha.

Iron Man Aridor cracked under the pressure. Eventually he gave them the opening they were waiting for when he tried to revamp the entire money laundering operation. According to police sources, the move led to an immediate outcry in the streets, with both gang veterans and the new generation threatening to revolt. In fear of his life, Aridor

Shapiro, vital statistics: 207 cms. (circumference), is playing hard to get. He is said to be insisting on a guarantee of an import permit for his Lincoln and repayment of the cost of his daughter's wedding.

"I'm still an amateur," he insisted. "But I want what's due to me. That wedding provided more fun for the nation than any event since last Yom Kippur."

Finance Minister Cohen-Orad grumbled that if he covered the cost of the wedding he would have to close down half the schools in the country, eliminate four squadrons of fighters and print 30 billion shekels. "It will get Shapiro into the Guinness Book of Records as the highest paid sportsman of all time," he claimed.

There is some doubt about the ability of the Likud's captain, Yitzhak Shamir (vital statistics: microscopic) to hold his team together. Nobody questions his ability to get under the baskets, but can he get on top of them? That is the great question generating a crisis in Likud. David Levy refuses to pass any balls to him, and Arik Sharon keeps trying to run him over with a tractor. Tami say that they will play under him, provided he gives Aharon Abuhatzzeira a free pardon and a trifling contribution to his charity ("Charity Begins at Home") chest. There is even some talk of begging that old veteran, nicknamed "The King," to come out of hiding to save the Likud.

But the Labour Party has just as many troubles. They have two players who both insist that they are the captains and playmakers and who block each other's plays, tackle each other by foul means or foul and are generally dedicated to ensuring that their opponents should win.

Rumour has it that the Labour Party may sideline both of them and introduce a new playmaker who has gone into the wilderness for 40 days to ask the Almighty what the terms of his contract should be. Labour also has doubts whether Yossi Sarid, the offensive left guard, has the physique to withstand a flat-out drive by his opposite number, right wing Gula Cohen.

The final problem is finding anybody brave enough to referee this match. Petitions have been addressed to the Lord to take on the job, but so far He is proving very coy about it.

Burgage

BURGEONINGS. An Autobiography. By Yosef Burg. Vol. I. The Early Years. 1909-1984. Peter Pan Books, Gadera. 5.367 groschen

WHEN RECENTLY Israel's Minister of Interior and for Religious Affairs was nominated for president (by, and of, the Ness Ziona Gerontological Association), there were many who thought him too raw, too immature, too, some even put it bluntly — young — for the post.

Publication of this first volume of his autobiography, covering his tempestuous youth in a Bochum street gang; his odd and barely hinted at relationship with a French uncle, Methuselah de Crepit; early, unfortunate, marriage to Mata Hari; sparkling successes and then dismal failures on the Amsterdam stock exchange, long nights pouring over his tomes at the university of Notre Dame; serene years of physical toil in Sejera, seven years strenuous training at the Sumo wrestling academy at Ai-no-take, all preparing him for leadership of the National Religious Party, which he has held for the past sixty-nine years, disproves this.

Born in Sprech, most of Salomon Yosef Burg's schooling was at the hochschule in Glü am Pantzen. Here, he tells us, he learned the importance of adhering to the job on hand. A jolly child, yet, we learn, with a serious vein looking always forward to his lifelong career, the book which had most influence on him, he writes, was Dr. Doolittle, his best-loved poet, Wordsworth. An avid reader of The Jerusalem Post, his favourite reporter, is Aaron Sittner.

As Interior Minister, Dr. Burg confesses, his main concern is the intensive first-hand study of the interiors of other countries in the western world. As the English say (he is fond of quoting English proverbs)

"travel broadens." So frequent a visitor is he to France, that the natives went so far as to name a whole city in honour of their cher Bourg. Likewise in South Africa, with a little more familiarity — Jo Burg, is how they say it. Dr. Burg is of course far too modest to include these facts more than three or four times in the volume under review.

Neither does he ignore the Jews of the world and he regularly broadcasts Bible and Talmud lessons to the Gola. Interestingly he does not comment here on allegations that he uses these broadcasts to include coded messages to book hotel rooms and seats at the Folies.

As Minister for Religious Affairs, he has broadened his relations with leaders of non-Jewish communities. He himself notes his affinity to the Vicar of Bray and his fondness for the Kadi of Ti. He refrains from mentioning that it was he who coined the witticism "Samovar best friends are non-Jews."

Dr. Burg properly pays warm tribute to the great strength he draws from that most energetic Caribbean sport, Cuba ski.

I can not do better in concluding this review than to quote some of his favourite aphorisms, drawn from holy script, that so characterize this young man on the threshold of a brilliant political future.

If I am not for myself, who will be for me?

If two people grasp a tallit, they should let me have it.

He who sits in the seat of the mighty, and sits and sits.

Let him love kingship and rule.

One should not sit in the seat of the old man. Get lost.

Jerusalem was destroyed only because the sons did not attend school, but demonstrated in the streets.

The maybe of the righteous is maybe, and their perhaps is perhaps. Pray for the welfare of the government, for were it not for the government, I'd be out of a job.

Gee, ta, you've fixed my guitar

You know, as I was saying to my grannie the other day, my ears are getting a little weary. Imagine, for two decades I've been looking and listening for a trip back to the original B-Gs and what do we get? The Shmears.

And they're still just trying to get their show together. Check out their latest album. Just do it. It's the mixture as before. How they got together in the first place I'll never guess. A weird assortment of combos, it sounds as though they get together mainly to yell at each other. They make music you can use to shout your mother down.

No match for the Goida oldies. Think of the Mods, for instance. They certainly have energy and they hit the right notes ninety per cent of the time. But what else?

PLOCK ETC. Dave Horror

Then there's the Grupp. He's great. Sounds like a tractor squashing grapes.

I must say that Arik Clapton lends them a bit of class with his tubs, although I don't somehow think it's first class.

And we have The Zip, on contra. Just try and get a line on him. He just doesn't ring a bell.

A new addition to the Shmears is the Kobinoor, replacing the Erie Doors. Check him out.

By the way, there seem an awful lot of Doors in the ensemble. Are they all necessary? Perhaps they should be slammed. There's the Merry Doors (what an odd name) and the Door-on, Door-off (even odder) and in the wings there's the humphry Savvy Door. My old Hebrew teacher used to say: "Door, door, and door shove off."

The Hamburgers, that duo with the dinky little patches on their noses, sound a little bit off. I wonder if their disharmony is perhaps deliberate?

The Ooze seems to labour a bit too much and he tries to get too much of whatever action's going.

The Miracle just is.

I wonder what Shoe Sticks is there for. He doesn't seem to add a lot.

Altogether the Shmears produce music like gorgonzola with kippers, I guess. Grannie would love it.

Your money & your life

QUESTION: I traded in my index-linked debentures in favour of 14 per cent off-listed registered security issues, deducting the interest of government-backed promissory conversions. How much did I earn in real terms?

ANSWER: In real terms? How much do you win in video games, in real terms?

Q: I know this may sound like a stupid question, but could you explain once and for all the difference between stocks and shares?

A: It is a stupid question, especially because the answer is so simple. Stocks is what your grocer does, as in: "Haim at the makolei stocks three different brands of peanut butter." Shares is what good little children at gan do at snack-time, as in: "Little Moshe shares his peanut-butter sandwich with Rutie — but only when Rutie stops cuddling him."

Q: What is meant by the term liquid asset?

A: I'm happy to answer this question, both because it's frequently asked and because it's one of the few terms I definitely know. A liquid asset is any property that is readily convertible to cash. Your stocks, for example. Your car. Your kids.

Q: It's said that a large portion of our balance-of-trade deficit results from the high cost of debt-servicing. What exactly is meant by debt-servicing?

A: Debts require constant care to keep them growing at a healthy rate, with strong teeth and a glossy coat. Debts must be combed and brushed daily, should have periodic shots, and must be fed calcium supplements. Proper care and exercise of one's debts mean a life-long, loyal companion. Remember, only well-groomed and robust debts can breed other debts.

Q: You often use the term "financial instrument." Can you define that for me?

A: A financial instrument is any instrument employed by the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange board of directors' marching band. This includes the horn of plenty, the trumpets of doom, the saxophone, the snare drum and, of course, the fiddle.

Q: I'm a new immigrant, and I'm puzzled by the acronyms Patam, Patash and so on. Can you explain these esoteric terms?

A: Patam is a term used by income-tax officials, taxi drivers and waiters; it stands for, "Pay The Money." Patash is a term used by government ministers, and stands for, "Pass The Hat." A term just now catching on is Patap — "Pay The Piper."

Q: I've read that the average Israeli family of four requires IS80,000 for its monthly expenses, but takes home only IS40,000 net, and yet in real terms spends IS120,000. How is this possible?

A: Prudent budgeting.

Q: I understand that we have simultaneous inflation, stagnation, devaluation, unemployment — and yet the stock market is booming. How is this possible — in real terms, I mean?

A: This is possible because we are not living in real terms. We're living on what's called borrowed time.

Q: If you're so smart, Joe, why aren't you rich?

A: I'm smart enough to know that in this country it doesn't pay to be rich. I earn my money trying to explain this to people. Clever people. Like you.

Our candid cameraman catches Salomon Yosef Burg lying for the first time.
